The wonderful immunity from accident and death, and the absolute freedom from danger of either upon the railroads of this country, demonstrate that railroad management here has practically reached perfection. It may be truly said that a passenger whirled through space at the rate of forty miles an hour in one of the coaches of the coaches of the Northwestern Railway company is in less hazard and less liable to accident than he would be in walking the streets of Chicago, and as safe from possible injury as he would be if seated at his own fireside. [illegible] first twenty years of railroad travel in the United States, as we learn from the report of the Rhode Island railroad commissioner, there was one passenger killed of every two millions carried, while in the succeeding twenty years there was but one killed of more than six millions carried. If we recognize the further fact that more than ninety per cent. of the passengers killed, meet their death by their own recklessness or by their disregard of the rules of the railroad companies, we might say that a number of passengers equaling the country's population are annually transported over our roads without a fatal accident that can be attributed to the fault of the railroad officials.

A sense of security on the part of the passenger, and the constant study of the railroad official to invoke every possible aid to promote the safety and comfort of patrons, make railroad travel a pleasure indeed. The newly invented air-brakes, the patent platform and couplings, the improved methods of tie and rail laying, and the perfect system of signals, combine to produce this extraordinary absolution from accident or injury.

We are led to these reflections from an intimate acquaintance with the workings of one of the best managed roads in the United States—the Chicago and Northwestern, whose operations extend from Chicago to the British possessions, and whose branches permeate every considerable point of traffic throughout the great northwest, and even to the Pacific coast. No ordinary mind can master the details of operating a huge corporation like this, whose hundreds of trains, passenger and freight, arrive and depart with the regularity of the clock; whose millions of passengers are transported, each with the self-assurance of a speedy, a safe and comfortable transit; whose officials without exception are men of long experience and excellent judgment in all things pertaining to the business in hand. There is not in all this country a company which maintains a better corps of conductors, many of whom the travelling public have met for twenty years past, and all of them gentlemen in the strictest sense of the term.

To the management is solely due the general excellence of this great highway, and we are glad to know that the vast business which the company is now doing, indicates the public appreciation of the efforts of the gentlemen to serve them.—The Herald, Sept. 1, 1879.

The Republican Scheme to Colonize Southern Negroes into Indiana.

[Cincinnati Bail.]

The history of the exodus in Kansas should make Indiana considerate. The negroes who have sought for homes in Kansas have experienced terrible disappointments. Though a great and comparatively new agricultural state, the negroes were not wanted. They have been from the first a charge upon the people of Kansas and of the whole country. They have died by hundreds and still Kansas is making appeals to the country for help. Indiana does not want such additions to her population. Her industries do not require the introduction of pauper labor from any quarter, and the laboring people of the state can not too soon place themselves on record as opposed to the exodus movement. It is fair to assume that the negro laborers of the south are as well paid as the average laborer of the north. They receive food, clothing and shelter. Does the average northern laborer receive more? In thousands of instances it is shown that the southern farm hand is able to save money and purchase land. Is this true of the northern farm laborer? It will be seen by a close examination of the subject that the negro in the south is getting along, all things considered, quite as well, if not better, than the farm laborers of Indiana: and that thousands of them should be induced to come to this state to embarrass and impoverish those who earn a livelihood as farm hands, can not be defended upon any principle of justice to either party or to either section. It is not philanthropic, for neither party is benefited. It is not in consonance with political economy, for it is not calculated to advance the general welfare; and since the exodus movement is not philanthropic nor economic, those engaged in carrying it forward should be persuaded to desist.

AGENTS WANTED!

THE NEW STYLE

$25 FAMILY SEWING MACHINE.

THE USUAL $65 MACHINE REDUCED TO $25.

$150 per Week Made Easy.

Horse and Wagon Free to Agt's

The CHEAPEST and BEST in the World.

Too Long in Use to Doubt Its Superior MERITS

No Money to Pay until Machine is Delivered to you and Examined.

It makes the shuttle, double-thread, lock-stitch, (the same on both sides of the work), which received the highest reward at the Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia, Pa., 1876. And is complete with a larger assortment of attachments for fine work than any other machine, and reduced to only $25.

It is an easy and pleasant machine to operate, requires the least care, produces every variety of work, and will last until the next century begins. Strong, simple, rapid and efficient.

Use it once and you will use no other. The money cheerfully refunded if it will not outwork and outlast any machine at double the price.

Agents sell them faster than any other in consequence of their being the "best at the lowest price."

Each machine thoroughly warranted with written guarantee for five years. Kept in order free of charge; money refunded at once if not satisfactory.

It is the most solid, reliable, and satisfactory machine ever invented for all kinds of family work. It is an acknowleged unequivocal mechanical success, thoroughly tested and used in thousands of homes. An efficient, silent, rapid, reliable and ever-ready helper to the weary wife or seamstress, it will do the work of a family for a lifetime, or it will earn from $4 to $5 per day for any one who wishes to sew for a living. This machine costs less than half the price of any new machine of like quality. Has extra long, large-sized shuttle, easily removed. Extra large-sized bobbins, holding 100 yards of thread, doing away with the frequent rewinding of bobbins. It is built for strength and constant hard work. Interchangeable working parts, manufactured of fine polished steel. Will run for years without repairs; is simple to learn, easy to manage, understood perfectly in an hour, and always ready in a moment to do every description of heavy or fine work, at less cost or trouble than any other machine at any price ever did or can do. It will sew anything a needle can pierce, from lace or cambric to heavy cloth or harness, with any kind of thread, and will run off twenty yards per minute; it uses strong, straight needles and never breaks them It cannot miss or drop a stitch, ravel or break the thread. If you have any other machine, buy this and have a better one. The ease and rapidity of its motion and quality of its work, are its best recommendations. It will hem, fell, tuck, braid, cord, bind, gather, quilt, ruffle, pleat, fold, scallop, shirr, roll, baste, embroider, run up braids, etc., with elegance, ease and quickness, unsurpassed by any machine ever invented.

BEWARE OF IMPOSITION.

The price for our new machines are less than those asked by dealers in second-hand, rebuilt and refinished machines, or those selling out old stock to close up business, many such inferior and old style machines being offered as new, at reduced prices; beware of imposition and only buy new machines. There are no new first-class machines offered as low as the "FAMILY," by many dollars.

Machines sent for Examination Before Payment of Bill.

Extraordinary inducements offered to clergymen, teachers, storekeepers, etc., to act as agents. Horse and wagon furnished free. For testimonials and descriptive books, mailed free with samples of work, liberal terms, circulars, etc. Address,

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

Died, at Farmington, Mass., the 31st ult., Jacob Abbott, a well-known author, and brother of John S. C. Abbott.

Nathan O. Greenfield has been three times tried for murder and twice sentenced to death, and his counsel are now endeavoring to secure for him a fourth trial. Over $40,000 have been expended in the three trials, and the county of Oswego, N. Y., which has been compelled to pay the enormous expense, is on the verge of bankruptcy in consequence.

A fire on Market street, Philadelphia, last week, destroyed property valued at $100,000....The works of the Metropolitan Button Company and the White Manufacturing Company, in Bridgeport, Ct., have been burned. Loss, $66,000....An Albany (N. Y.) jury has returned a verdict in favor of Thomas J. Jackson against the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern railroad for $20,000. The action was for injuries sustained by Jackson, who was a passenger on the train that broke through the bridge at Ashtabula, Dec. 29, 1876.

The failure of Isador & Hein, New York fur dealers, is announced. Liabilities about $150,000.

A locomotive and passenger coach on the New York and Greenwood Lake railroad plunged into the Hackensack river, owing to the draw being open, a few mornings ago. There were twenty passengers in the coach, nearly all of them business men on their way to New York, several of whom were badly bruised, and all had a narrow escape from drowning. The engineer of the train was killed.

A Boston dispatch reports that a schooner went ashore in a gale at Cape Elizabeth, and all hands were lost.

A dispatch from Kennett, Pa., says the residence of J. and G. F. Bailey, north of that town, was entered by three masked burglars, who rifled the safe, extracting therefrom money, bonds and securities amounting to $250,000.

THE SOUTH.

During the prevalence of the yellow-fever epidemic in Memphis this year, the total number of cases of the disease reported to the Board of Health was 1,521; total deaths, 473....A collision between Federal and State authorities which threatens serious results has occurred in Wheeler county, Texas. Deputy United States Marshals have been arresting citizens on blank warrants; Sheriffs and constables in retaliation have imprisoned Deputy Marshals, and warrants are out for nearly every official, local and national, in the neighborhood of the disturbance. Fearing trouble of a more serious character, the Governor has ordered a company of troops to the spot, and Attorney General Devens has directed that an investigation be made.

The town of Helena, Ark., located on the Mississippi river, has been visited by a destructive conflagration. The loss is estimated at $100,000.

THE WEST.

In July last a man named McLean was bitten in the hand at Chicago by one of his dogs. A few days ago he was seized with symptoms of hydrophobia. Physicians were summoned, but they could do nothing for the doomed man, and after lingering a few days he died in the most horrible agony. It is not known certainly that the dog which inflicted the bite was mad, as it was killed at the time....Charles De Young, of the San Francisco Chronicle, who some weeks ago shot Rev. I. S. Kalloch, has been indicted for assault to murder.

Big Snake, a Ponca Indian chief, and brother of Standing Bear, was recently shot and killed at the Ponca Agency while resisting arrest.

Advices from Los Pinos, Col., chronicle the safe arrival there of Gen. Adams and Count Doenhoff, the peace commissioners who negotiated the release of the Meeker family. They made a narrow escape from being shot when they came in sight of Merritt's command. They were mistaken for hostile Indians, and the soldiers had covered them with their rifles and were in the act of firing, when the timely display of a white flag averted the impending calamity.—Gen. Adams reports to Secretary Schurz that he had another long council with White River Utes at Grand river; that they are willing that the guilty parties be surrendered and punished; that he has faith in Ouray's ability to compel the surrender of those found to be guilty, and that in order to assure this he (Adams) recommends the appointment of a commission of three (one of the number to be a military officer) to make thorough investigation to find out the guilty and determine their punishment. Secretary Schurz approved the plan, and ordered Gen. Adams to go ahead.—Gen. Adams telegraphs Secretary Schurz that Chief Ouray has ordered the White River Utes to come to Uncompahgre, where a commission is to sit to investigate the White River massacre, and where those found guilty are to be surrendered.

For downright, unadulterated "cheek" commend us to the Ute Indian. Advices from Gen. Merritt's command state that a Ute warrior came into his camp ostensibly to treat for peace. On receiving the information that the troops were not authorized to open negotiations of that character, he notified them that, if they would surrender their arms, horses and supplies, they would be permitted to leave the Ute country in safety; otherwise, not one of them would escape. The General gave his cheerful visitor an escort outside of his pickets....The heavy dry-goods-jobbing and importing firm of Stettauer Brothers & Co., of Chicago, has failed for about $1,500,000. The house was established in Chicago in 1867, the members of the firm having previously accumulated a large capital in the mercantile business at Leavenworth, Kansas. They did a heavy business in Chicago, their annual sales amounting to $5,000,000 or $6,000,000. Their paper is held principally in New York and Boston....A fight between a posse of detectives and the James boys is reported to have occurred a few days ago, in the vicinity of Joplin, Mo. Jesse James is reported to have been killed. Another of the robbers was wounded. One of the detectives was shot in the thigh and badly hurt.

Maj. Morrow and his command, who were sent out now a month since in pursuit of the Apache chief, Victoria, and his followers, and who pursued them across the line to their hiding-place in Mexico, returned to Fort Bogart, N. M., a little the worse for wear, but full of life and spirit still. Morrow lost two men killed and had two wounded. Victoria's band scattered, and Morrow, being 200 miles from his supplies, and two days' march from the line, was compelled to return. But the command underwent much hardship, at one time being seventy hours without water. The command lost a great many animals.

Gen. Grant arrived at Galena, Ill., his old home, on Wednesday, Nov. 5, thus completing his journey around the world. All along the route across the continent from San Francisco the ex-President was accorded the same hearty greeting which he met when first landing upon his native shores at the Golden Gate. At Virginia City, Salt Lake, Omaha, Burlington, and other prominent points, stops were made for the purpose of enabling the populations to honor the distinguished traveler. At Council Bluffs the General was taken in charge by Gov. Gear and a delegation of the Grand Army of the Republic, and the journey across the State of Iowa was a continual ovation. At Galena the General's old friends and neighbors, reinforced by large numbers of admirers from abroad, turned out and gave him a royal reception.

Chicago elevators contain 5,001,810 bushels of wheat, 1,935,763 bushels of corn, 841,354 bushels of oats, 134,205 bushels of rye, and 654,402 bushels of barley, making a grand total of 8,567,613 bushels, against 7,794,180 bushels a week ago and 3,903,701 bushels at this period last year.

Maj. Reno, Seventh cavalry, who was suspended on account of conduct toward Mrs. Bell, wife of an officer of his regiment, and who since went through a court of inquiry regarding his conduct in the battle of the Little Big Horn, where Custer was killed, is again in trouble, and again it is on account of abusive conduct toward a lady. At Fort Meade, where he is stationed, he got drunk and grossly insulted Mrs. Farnshaw, the wife of the Post-Trader. One of Farnshaw's clerks knocked him down. Afterward, at the post club-room, he got into a quarrel with Maj. Brewer, Surgeon, and was again knocked down. Gen. Sturgis has preferred charges against Reno, and this time he will probably be ignominiously kicked out of the army.

The only indignity offered Gen. Grant during his journey across was at Galesburg, Ill. The train reached there in the evening, and the General was taken from the train to a flat car, where he was introduced and made a few remarks. He was about to return to the car, when some miscreant in the crowd flung an egg, which struck him on the side of the head. A citizen stepped forward and offered $100 reward for the detection and arrest of the ruffian.

Dennis A. Maloney, an old Iowa journalist, and for many years proprietor of the Dubuque Telegraph, died a few days ago aged 63 years....A criminal indictment has been returned by the Chicago Grand Jury against Henry Greenebaum, the wealthy Hebrew ex-banker, for violation of the National Bankrupt laws....Three Indian murderers confined in jail at Yakima, W. T., assaulted the jailer with a slung-shot improvised with a stone. He escaped into an adjoining room used as an armory. The Indians seized muskets and bayoneted him. The jailer got a revolver and shot all three. One was mortally wounded, and the others will probably live to be hanged. The jailer will recover.

Chicago's receipts of grain since Jan. 1 amount to 29,182,853 bushels of wheat; 56,108,083 bushels of corn; 12,396,823 bushels of oats; 2,087,209 bushels of rye, and 3,097,411 bushels of barley. For the corresponding time in 1878 the local receipts of wheat were 23,223,196 bushels; of corn, 57,179,556 bushels; of oats, 16,224,866 bushels; of rye, 2,137,196 bushels, and of barley, 4,834,016 bushels....An employe at the White River Agency, who escaped a violent death by being away from his post when Meeker and the others fell, says that Chief Douglass, who planned the Ute uprising, was a participant in the massacre at Mountain Meadows. He claims to have obtained his information by overhearing a quarrel between the chiefs at the agency, some time ago, in which one of them threatened Douglass with exposure on account of his services for the Mormons in that dreadful butchery.

Ex Gov. Brown, of Tennessee, Vice President of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, has arrived in Washington, and confirms the report that the company has no purpose of making any further application to Congress for a subsidy....The President has appointed Albert Johnson Surveyor General of Colorado.

Gens. Adams and Hatch and Chief Ouray have been appointed a peace commission to visit the hostile Ute camp and investigate the killing of Maj. Thornburgh and his followers.

WASHINGTON.

The Comptroller of the Currency says the increase in the national-bank circulation for October was about $3,000,000.

There is a rumor at Washington that the English mission has been tendered to ex-President Woolley, of Yale College.

As a mark of respect to the memory of the late Senator Chandler, the President issued an order directing that the several Executive Departments be closed to public business, and their flags and those of their dependencies throughout the country be displayed at half-mast on the day of his funeral.

In his annual report, just submitted to the President, Gen. Sherman dwells at considerable length on the fact that, while the regular army consists of 25,000 men, only about 20,000 are available for actual service. Nearly 4,000 enlisted men are detailed for various duties, all of them so important that he has found it impossible to reduce the number. Believing that 25,000 men would be none too many for exclusive service in the regiments of the line, he again urges that Congress increase the army to that extent.

The President's message this year will be a comparatively brief document. The President said the other day that he did not intend to make any recommendations of any account to Congress. He is at present disposed to confine himself to a simple review of the work of the departments and an allusion to the prosperous condition of the country. He says that he has some suggestions that he would like to make, but is inclined, so far as he is concerned, to simply let well enough alone; that the country is very prosperous, and the less legislation it has, the better; that his suggestions might only result in needless discussion and a disturbance of the present comfortable condition of things. So, from all the indications, the message this year promises to be nothing more than a routine report....Rear Admiral Reynolds, of the United States navy, died at his home in Washington last week.

GENERAL.

A destructive storm recently visited the Eastern section of Nova Scotia, causing great destruction of property and some loss of life....Clark Brown was hanged last week at Conywall, Canada, for the murder of his father and sister. He made a confession of the crime and admitted the justice of the sentence.

Burned: The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Company's building, 155 State street, Chicago, loss $15,000; A. H. Andrews & Co.'s furniture manufactory, corner of Halsted and Polk streets, Chicago, loss $75,000; one-third the town of Mound City, Ill., loss $80,000; Striker & Hammond's wagon factory, at Logansport, Ind., loss $40,000; a block of buildings at Bridgeton, Me., loss $20,000; J. B. Griswold's lumber yard at Greenville, Mich., loss $14,000; the depot of the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago railroad at Michigan City, Ind., loss $20,000.

The Women's National Temperance Convention has just held its annual session at Indianapolis, 146 delegates being in attendance. Miss Frances E. Willard, of Evanston, Ill., was elected President for the ensuing year. The following congratulatory dispatch was sent to Mrs. President Hayes: "The women of the National Christian Temperance Union, now in session, send greeting. 'Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ. I thank my God upon every remembrance of you.'" It was stated by a delegate that not a single drop of liquor had been at the White House, even for cooking purposes, since Mrs. Hayes entered it.

The remains of Senator Chandler were consigned to earth on the 5th inst., at Detroit, with impressive ceremonies. Many prominent officials, State and national, were present. The body was laid in state in the City Hall for a few hours in the forenoon, and was viewed by thousands....Gen. Hooker's obsequies at New York, on the same day, were also largely attended. The remains were taken to Cincinnati for burial.

Ex-President Grant will visit Indianapolis about the 20th of December. He will go thence to Columbus, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Washington, after which he will make a trip into the Southern States, and will probably extend his journey to Mexico and Cuba.

Hanlan, the Canadian oarsman, intends visiting England to defend his title to the championship....By way of San Francisco it is learned that a formidable conspiracy for the overthrow of the Diaz Government exists, and that agents of the revolutionary leaders are now in this country seeking aid and comfort.

POLITICAL.

It is understood by the friends of Secretary Evarts, says a Washington correspondent, that he is now looking forward to an election to the United States Senate, in place of Senator Kernan.

Official vote of California at the September election: Perkins, Republican, 67,965; Glenn, Democrat, 47,047; White, Kearney, 44,482; Clark, Prohibition, 1,200. An official canvass of the vote of Iowa at the October election shows the following result on Governor: Gear, Republican, 157,571; Trimble, Democrat, 85,057; Campbell, Greenbacker, 45,429; Dungan, Prohibitionist, 3,258. Total vote, 291,315. Gear's majority over Trimble, 72,495; over Campbell, 111,454; over all others combined, 23,808.

FOREIGN.

A Rome dispatch says that France and England now regret not having agreed to accept the co-operation of Italy in Egypt. Italy has been compelled to form with Germany and Austria a league against the excessive preponderance of England and France....It is stated that Capt. Carey, the officer who was with the Prince Imperial when he lost his life, will retire from the army and enter the church....J. B. Buckstone, the well-known English comedian and playwriter, is dead. He was 77 years old....Cardinal Manning has authorized a general subscription among the Catholic temperance organizations of Great Britain for the relief of the popular distress in the South and West of Ireland....A cable dispatch announces that Russia already so keenly realizes her isolation that she is seeking admission to the Austro-German alliance. It is also reported that a meeting of the three Emperors is probable.

It is stated in a cable dispatch that the "creditors of the Egyptian Government have not seized the obelisk, but threaten to do so. It seems there is no court in Egypt of competent jurisdiction to issue a writ for the seizure. Mariett Pasha, who has charge of the Egyptian monuments, opposes the removal, and urges the French Consul to protest to the Khedive on the ground that such a removal will be a violation of the convention between Egypt and the European powers, by which it is provided that no Egyptian monument or work of art shall leave the country. Commander Gorringe has hoisted the American flag over the obelisk, and surrounded it with a guard of policemen from the Consulate. He declares that he will resist with force any attempt to interfere with him."

The Russian newspapers are just getting the news of the defeat which their arms suffered at the hands of the Turcomans in Central Asia. The affair appears to have been a second Plevna. The chief St. Petersburg newspaper admits that the defeat was a rout, and that the percentage of the Russian loss was enormous and unprecedented....Sir Stafford Northcote, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answering a letter calling his attention to the distress in Southwestern Ireland, and suggesting immediate action by the Government in providing work for the people, says he sympathizes with the people, but can only refer them to the Irish Executive. He adds: "Direct interposition by the Government would be open to great abuse."

Constantinople advices represent that the relations between England and Turkey are greatly strained. England has sent to the Porte an ultimatum demanding the execution of reforms in Asiatic Turkey. If the demand is not complied with it is believed the Sultan will be deposed and replaced by his brother, who will be under the tutelary supervision of England, France, and Austria. It is said Russia upholds the Sultan....A late Cabul dispatch says that eleven prisoners have been executed for participation in the massacre of the British Embassy, and sixty persons have been examined since the trials began....The English journals allege that there is no good ground of apprehension of serious trouble with Russia, and argue the absence of an ostensible cause for any rupture of the peaceful relations. At the same time they admit that Russia's programme in the East demands the constant vigilance of England....The illness of Prince Bismarck, which was at first supposed to be nothing worse than an ordinary attack of neuralgia, has recently developed more serious symptoms. While his physicians do not anticipate grave results, his condition is such that it does not warrant any hope of his speedy return to the duties of his office.

Information has been received from Africa to the effect that Prof. Rohlf, the German explorer, who recently set out with an expedition for the Kufara oasis, was robbed on his arrival there of all his valuables, and that he and his comrades had been forced to return for a new outfit.

It is stated that the British Government has decided to send two regiments of cavalry and a body of infantry to Ireland.

The Spanish Chamber of Deputies has voted the future Queen an allowance of $90,000 per annum....News comes from Havana that the new insurrection in Cuba has been stamped out....An accident occurred to a passenger train near Arconum, in British India, in consequence of the sinking of an embankment after a rain; nineteen persons, including three Europeans, were killed and forty-five wounded....Information comes from Europe that a most startling and remarkable change has taken place in the mental condition of the unfortunate ex-Empress Carlotta, widow of Maximilian, and her speedy and perfect restoration is now believed to be not only probable, but almost certain, to take place. She now converses lucidly and intelligently. Her memory has returned, and she discusses logically and clearly of her present surroundings and future prospects. Her condition now plainly indicates that the long night of oblivion and insanity which has enveloped her is nearly at an end, and that the unfortunate lady whose sad story has enlisted the sympathies of the civilized world will soon be restored to reason....Startling intelligence comes from Ireland of the condition of the peasantry. It is universally acknowledged that unless they receive assistance there must inevitably be great suffering and possibly starvation during the coming winter. The situation is regarded as very grave throughout Ireland, and it is receiving the serious attention of the Government.

POSTAL AFFAIRS.

The report of the Auditor of the Treasury of the Postoffice Department, for the year ending the 30th of June last, shows that the actual cost of postal service during this period was only $3,031,455, a remarkably small deficit, which is nearly $1,000,000 less than that of the preceding year. The total revenue of the Postoffice Department the last fiscal year was $30,041,982, an increase of $764,465, and the total expenses, $33,023,437, a decrease of $1,001,647, in comparison with the preceding year. Of the last-named amount $795,612 was saved by the law which changed the basis of Postmasters' compensation from commission on stamps sold to a commission on stamps canceled, and the remainder by reduction of compensation allowed railroads. The States returning large revenues were New York, with $5,710,310; Pennsylvania, $2,752,563; Illinois, $2,398,627; Massachusetts, $2,087,228; Ohio, $1,970,440; Missouri, $1,124,553, and Michigan, $1,004,487. Alaska foots the list with a revenue of $53. The principal items of expenditure were as follows:

Compensation of Postmasters	$7,162,989
Clerks in postoffices	3,415,296
Letter carriers	1,947,776
Railroad transportation	9,126,736
Star service (i. e., by horses and ordinary vehicles)	5,537,345
Steamboat service	863,107
Foreign mail transportation	268,917
Receipts—
Total receipts from stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal-cards	29,147,074
From box rents	1,361,169
Net revenue from money-order business	219,226

The aggregate gross revenue at the eighty-eight free-delivery postoffices was about $13,000,000, and their gross expenses (including pay of the letter carriers, etc.) amounted to little more than $5,000,000. The number of domestic money orders issued during the fiscal year was 6,872,343, amounting to $88,254,541, and the foreign money-order business was as follows: Canada, 16,231 orders issued, amounting to $316,288, and 26,757 orders paid, amounting to $339,072; Great Britain, 64,319 orders issued, amounting to $894,850, and 19,740 orders paid, amounting to $345,761; Germany, 47,542 orders issued, amounting to $820,788, and 26,462 orders paid, amounting to $630,542; Switzerland, 5,136 orders issued, amounting to $96,171, and 2,010 orders paid, amounting to $55,829; Italy, 4,070 orders issued, amounting to $103,352, and 349 orders paid, amounting to $10,040; total amount of fees on orders issued, $502,042, and total net revenue to Government from this source, $219,226.

NATIONAL FINANCES.

THE REDEMPTION BUREAU.

Following is a statement of the operations of the National Bank Redemption Agency for October and the four months ending Nov. 1, compared with the corresponding periods of last year:

National-bank Notes Disposed of.	October.	Four Months.
Notes fit for circulation assorted and returned to bank of issue	$1,764,800	$13,026,750
Notes unfit for circulation, assorted and deliver'd to Comptroller for destruction and replacement with new notes	1,646,900	9,453,500
Notes failed, liquidating, and reducing banks deposited in treasury	359,500	1,831,900
Totals for '79	3,771,200	24,311,400
Totals for '78	12,478,650	67,022,850
Decrease	8,707,450	42,711,450

NOTE CIRCULATION.

The Comptroller of the Currency reports the whole amount of additional circulation issued since the publication of his annual report in November, 1878, as $15,435,875. The total average amount issued the past twelve months has been at the rate of about $1,300,000 per month. The increase of circulation for the year ending Nov. 1, 1879, was $4,216,084, and the total decrease from Jan. 14, 1875, to the 1st of November, 1877, was more than $30,000,000. The total amount issued for the month of October was $3,602,050, and during the months of September and October $7,514,170, or about one-half of the whole amount issued during the year. The increase in legal-tender notes deposited for the purpose of retiring circulation during the year ending Nov. 1, 1879, was $3,279,001, leaving the net increase of national-bank circulation issued during the year at $11,484,582.

SIX-PER-CENT. BONDS.

A circular was issued by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st inst., giving notice that proposals would be received at the office of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York until the 8th inst., for the sale to the Government of $10,000,000 of any of the 6 per cent. interest-bearing bonds of the United States, the bonds purchased to be applied to the sinking fund, as provided in Sec. 3,694 of the Revised Statutes.

A Monkey's Trick.

One of the best things that ever was heard of happened in France not many weeks ago. There lives in the South of France a man of wealth, whose chateau or country place of residence has around it very tall trees. The cook of the chateau has a monkey, a pert fellow who knows ever so many tricks. The monkey often helps the cook to pluck the feathers from fowls. On the day that interests us the cook gave the monkey two partridges to pluck, and the monkey, seating himself on an open window, went to work. He had picked the feathers from one of the partridges and placed it on the outer ledge of the window with a satisfied grunt, when, lo! all at once a hawk flew down from one of the tall trees near by and bore off the plucked bird. Master Monkey was very angry. He shook his fist at the hawk, which took a seat on one of the limbs not far off and began to eat the partridge with great relish. The owner of the chateau saw the sport, for he was sitting in a grape arbor, and crept up to see the end of it. The monkey picked the other partridge and laid it on the ledge in the same place, then hiding behind the window screen on the inside. The hawk was caught in this trap, for when it flew down after the partridge out reached the monkey and caught the thief. In a moment the hawk's neck was wrung and the monkey soon had the hawk plucked. Taking the two birds to the cook, the monkey handed them to him as if to say: "Here are your two partridges, master." The cook thought that one of the birds looked queer, but he served them on the table. The owner of the house shook his head when he saw the dish, and, telling the cook of the trick, laughed heartily.

HON. ZACH. CHANDLER.

Sudden and Unexpected Death of the Michigan Senator.

Hon. Zachariah Chandler, United States Senator from Michigan, who had been making a series of Republican speeches in Wisconsin, stopped over at Chicago, en route home, and addressed a large meeting of Republicans at McCormick Hall in that city, on the night of the 31st of October. He spoke nearly two hours in his usual vigorous, slam-bang, sledge-hammer style, and nearly the last words uttered by the speaker on the platform were (referring to the Republican party): "We ain't a going to die yet; we have made other arrangements."

After the delivery of his fierce philippic against the Democracy Mr. Chandler was driven to the Grand Pacific Hotel, where some time was spent in conversation with personal and political friends. He seemed to be in his usual robust health. Between 12 and 1 o'clock he retired for the night, remarking at the time that he felt tired. About 8 o'clock the next morning (Nov. 1), Mr. Chandler not yet having risen, a knock on his door for the purpose of awakening him elicited no response. The knocking was repeated several times by the servants with the same result, when the state of affairs was reported to the office. The hotel officials, now alarmed at the ominous silence of Mr. Chandler, entered the room by means of a pass-key. Their worst fears were realized. Senator Chandler lay prone upon the bed, in the cold embrace of death. At what hour the dread messenger came is not exactly known, but it is conjectured that it was not long after Mr. Chandler retired. The doctors declare that heart disease was the cause of his death.

The dead Senator, when first discovered, was half-sitting, half-lying upon the bed, his legs hanging over the side, the right foot on the floor, and the left foot raised a foot or so above it. The death had evidently been a peaceful one. The eyes were closed, and an expression of calm repose lay on the features. The appearance of the room was indicative of a man who had lain down to rest for a few hours in the full rush of an active career. His watch was lying under a pillow and still going. His dressing-case was open, a clean shirt was laid on one side, and his clothing carefully placed upon a chair. A consultation of eminent physicians was called to decide upon the causes that produced death. It was ascertained that Mr. Chandler had exposed himself greatly during his speaking tour in Wisconsin, particularly at Janesville, where he spoke twice in one day in a tent, where the temperature was very low, and that he had been disturbed for a day or two by pains in the chest and stomach. One or two of the physicians were in favor of a post-mortem examination, but, in deference to the feelings of the family and friends of the deceased, they were overruled, and the council of medical experts decided to simply examine the body externally and submit their views to the Coroner's jury. After a careful examination of the body, and an inquiry into the circumstances connected with the death of the deceased, they gave a written opinion to the effect that Mr. Chandler "died from natural causes—probably cerebral hemorrhage." The Coroner's jury accordingly rendered a verdict to the same effect.

The stern demands of the law in cases of sudden death having been complied with, the body of the deceased was again taken charge of by friends, and arrangements made for the funeral. A committee of thirty prominent citizens was delegated to accompany the remains to Detroit. On Sunday morning, Nov. 2, the body was escorted to the depot by a large civic and military procession, and dispatched to Detroit over the Michigan Central railroad.

Biographical.

Mr. Chandler was nearly 66 years old at the time of his death, having been born at Bedford, N. H., on the 10th of December, 1813. His education was limited to that of the common schools and academy in his native State. In [illegible] afterward engaged in the dry-goods business. He was elected Mayor of Detroit in 1851, and in 1852 was the nominee of the Whig party for Governor of Michigan. He made an active canvass and ran far ahead of his ticket, but the Democratic party was then in ascendancy in the State. In 1857, the Republican party having come into power in Michigan, Chandler was elected to the United States Senate to succeed Lewis Cass, and took his seat March 4, 1857.

He at once took prominent and radical ground in hostility to the encroachments of slavery. He was re-elected in 1863, and again in 1869, thus serving in the Senate eighteen years. Mr. Chandler was made Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and held that position until the expiration of his third term, March 3, 1875. In the Senatorial election by the Michigan Legislature in 1875, he was nominated by the Republicans for a fourth term. The Republican Legislative Majority that year was but ten on joint ballot, and on the first vote by both houses Jan. 21, 1875, Mr. Chandler lacked three votes of being elected, owing to a very decided opposition of a few Republicans opposed to him. On the second ballot the Democrats, with one exception, voted with six bolting Republicans for Isaac P. Christiancy, one of the Supreme Court Judges, and the latter was thus elected by one majority. Oct. 19, 1875, Mr. Chandler was appointed Secretary of Interior by President Grant, holding the position until after the inauguration of President Hayes. On the 10th of February last, Senator Christiancy resigned his office to accept the position of United States Minister to Peru, and on the 18th of the same month Mr. Chandler was elected to fill the vacancy.

Mr. Chandler left a will. His estate, consisting principally of valuable real estate in Detroit, and an interest in a large mercantile establishment in the same city, is estimated at about $1,800,000. Mr. Chandler's only immediate relative, besides his wife and only daughter, Mrs. Eugene Hale, the wife of the well-known Maine Congressman, and her three children, is an aged sister, Mrs. Lee, who lives at Bedford, N. H. His brothers are all dead.

Thanksgiving.

PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT.

At no recurrence of the season which the devout habits of a religious people has made the occasion for giving thanks to Almighty God and humbly invoking His continued favor has the material prosperity enjoyed by our whole country been more conspicuous, more manifold, or more universal. During the past year, also, unbroken peace with all foreign nations, the general prevalence of domestic tranquillity, the supremacy and security of the great institutions of civil and religious freedom, have gladdened the hearts of our people and confirmed their attachment to the Government which the wisdom and courage of our ancestors so fitly framed, and the wisdom and courage of their descendants have so firmly maintained, to be the habitation of liberty and justice to successive generations.

Now, therefore, I, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, do appoint Thursday, the 27th day of November, instant, as a day of national thanksgiving and prayer, and I earnestly recommend that, withdrawing themselves from secular cares and labor, the people of the United States do meet together on that day in their respective places of worship, there to give thanks and praise to Almighty God for His mercies, and to devoutly beseech their continuance.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this 3d day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and fourth.

[Seal.] RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

By the President:

WILLIAM M. EVARTS, Secretary of State.

S. L. Harvey, of Greenville, Pa., met with a singular accident a few days ago. He had boiled some chestnuts. After taking them from the pot he poured cold water on them, and immediately placed one in his mouth for the purpose of breaking the shell. The hot water had filled the nut with steam, and when the shell burst the steam escaped, burning the gentleman's mouth so badly that he was unable to partake of food for two days.

THE ELECTIONS.

General elections were held in eleven States on Tuesday, Nov. 4, and local elections were held in Illinois, Georgia and a few other States. The results of the polling, as indicated by the returns received on the morning after the election, are summarized below:

New York.—The election in New York was for State officers, 32 State Senators, and 128 Assemblymen. There were seven parties in the field, with five candidates for Governor. Alonzo B. Cornell, the Republican candidate for Governor, is elected by a plurality of about 20,000. The remainder of the State officers chosen are Democrats, as follows: Lieutenant Governor, Clarkson N. Potter; Comptroller, Frederick P. Olcott; Secretary, Allen C. Beach; Treasurer, James Mackin; Attorney General, Aug. Schoonmaker; Engineer, Horatio Seymour, Jr.; Congress, Twelfth, Waldo Hutchins. The Legislature is largely Republican in both branches.

Wisconsin.—The entire Republican State ticket was successful in Wisconsin by a majority it is estimated at this time at 20,000. The State officers chosen are: Governor, William E. Smith; Lieutenant Governor, James M. Bingham; Secretary, Hans B. Warner; Treasurer, Richard Guenther; Attorney General, Alexander Wilson; Superintendent Public Instruction, W. C. Whitford.

Massachusetts.—The Republican ticket is elected by a majority of between 12,000 and 16,000 over Butler, Adams polling a very light vote. The State officials chosen are as follows: Governor, John D. Long; Lieutenant Governor, Byron Weston; Secretary, Henry B. Peirce; Treasurer, Charles Endicott; Auditor, Charles R. Ladd; Attorney General, George Marston.

Pennsylvania.—The Republicans carry Pennsylvania by an estimated majority of 25,000 or 40,000. The election was for a State Treasurer. Samuel Butler, of Chester county, is the successful man.

Nebraska.—In Nebraska the election was for a Supreme Court Judge and two University Regents. The Republican candidates, as named below, were chosen by a majority of about 12,000: Supreme Court Judge, Amasa Cobb; University Regents, John L. Carson and Jos. W. Gannett.

New Jersey.—The returns thus far received show that the Republicans of New Jersey have gained one State Senator and two or three members of the Assembly. They will probably retain control of both branches of the Legislature.

Connecticut.—The election in Connecticut was for the Legislature only, and for the Senate elections were held in only eleven of twenty-one districts. In these the Republicans elect ten and Democrats one. Of the Senators elected last year, who hold over this year, seven are Republicans and three Democrats, so that the Senate will stand seventeen Republicans and four Democrats. The House will probably stand about 153 to 93, or a Republican majority of between sixty and seventy on joint ballot.

Illinois.—In Illinois elections were held for county officers. General interest was centered principally in the contest in Chicago and Cook county. The Republicans carried the county, electing their entire ticket by majorities ranging from 7,000 to 11,000. The Republican majority in the city proper is about 5,000.

Minnesota.—In Minnesota the whole Republican ticket was chosen by majorities estimated at this writing at 8,000 to 12,000.

Mississippi.—The election in Mississippi was for State Senators and members of the Legislature. The Democrats carry all but a few counties.

Virginia.—The election in Virginia was for members of the General Assembly, and created more interest than any election in that State for many years. The issue was solely on the repeal of the McCulloch Debt bill, a settlement of the State debt submitted by the creditors, passed by the last Legislature. The returns indicate that a majority of the people in the State are opposed to a settlement of the debt on the basis of the McCulloch bill, and, in fact, on any other basis that will be acceptable to the creditors.

Maryland.—Maryland voted for State officers, State Senators and members of the Legislature. The entire Democratic ticket—Governor, William L. Hamilton; Comptroller, Thomas J. Keating; Attorney General, Charles J. M. Gwynn; Clerk of the Court of Appeals, Spencer C. Jones—was elected by about 15,000 majority. The Legislature is largely Democratic in both branches.

OBITUARY.

GEN. JO HOOKER.

Gen. Hooker was born at Hadley, Mass., in 1815, and died at Garden City, L. I., Oct. 31, 1879. He graduated at West Point in 1837, served in the Florida war, and in the war with Mexico. He resigned his commission in the army in 1853. He re-entered the military service at the beginning of the late civil war, and took an active part in McClellan's peninsular campaign. He commanded a grand division under Burnside at the battle of Fredericksburg. He succeeded to the command of the Army of the Potomac Jan. 26, 1863, and fought the battle of Chancellorsville. He resigned shortly after, and was succeeded by Gen. Meade. He was transferred to the West, where he distinguished himself in the series of battles fought around Chattanooga in November, 1863, his best-known and most highly appreciated exploit being the storming of Lookout mountain.

AUBURN COURIER.

THEO. [illegible]
[illegible] J. LOWRY } Editors.

THE deficiency in the beet-sugar crop in France, which is one of the most important staples of that country, is from 25 to 50 per cent.

"OLD MOORE," the English almanac-maker, in whose prophecies many people have faith, notwithstanding the fact that they are hardly ever verified, predicts the death of Prince Bismarck in 1880, and the retirement of Lord Beaconsfield; also the revival of English prosperity.

TWO CHICAGO men went on a week's spree, which involved an irregular tour through the West. One morning they awoke in a hotel, with a dazed notion as to what city they were in. One said St. Louis, and the other Cincinnati. They bet $100 as to which was right, and neither won, for the bell-boy informed them that the place was Milwaukee.

THE Government is building a series of towers between Lake Michigan and the Gulf of Mexico, for the purpose of making a survey of the Mississippi river and its tributaries, with the object of determining the true water course from the lakes to the gulf. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars was appropriated by the last Congress for this purpose.

THE last fiscal year it cost the Postoffice Department $3,000,000 more than its receipts to run it; the year previous it cost $5,000,000 more than the receipts. This indicates that the time for a 2-cent postage rate has about come. Of course the department should be self-supporting; but whenever the receipts come nearly up to the expenses a move toward lower rates is in order. The cheaper the postoffice can be made to work the better for the community; for it is a great public educator.

THE disaster to the German Government by the sinking of one of its finest ships, it seems, has taught it a lesson. The construction of all heavy ironclads has been discontinued in the imperial navy. Their places are to be supplied by small vessels with uncommonly powerful engines. They are to be armed with one rotating cannon each, the projectile of which will pierce the heaviest cuirass in use at the distance of three miles. Such a navy will not only be effective in defending harbors and roadsteads, but in covering the landing of a hostile army.

A WILD man has been found near North Adams, Mass. While two men were hunting in the vicinity of Cobble mountain, the other day, they were suddenly startled by a huge creature jumping from a thicket, which bore the resemblance of half man and half animal. One of the hunters fired at it and apparently wounded it in one arm, as it set up a terrible noise and began licking the injured member. It soon stopped its noise, and, looking up and beholding its assailants, started for them on a dead run. The hunters took to their heels and a lively chase of over a mile was kept up, the pursued finally escaping.

FEW people, probably, have any idea of what a vast concern is the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, which comes before Congress at almost every session for a lumping subsidy for carrying the mails. Within the last seven years a fleet of iron steamers, costing about $9,500,000, has been built, and these are now all in good condition and earning money. Two of these vessels are running between San Francisco and Australia, enjoying a subsidy from the Australian Government of $29,000 on every round trip, and two are running between Panama and San Francisco. The present fleet consists of sixteen iron screw steamers and four wooden side-wheel steamboats.

FRENCH and Italian journalists have recovered from the stupor into which they were thrown by the announcement of the Austro-German alliance, and now discuss the matter with a certain degree of freedom. In referring to Lord Salisbury's hopeful predictions that the agreement will strengthen the peace of Europe, a Paris newspaper says it will more likely lead to dangerous complications and disastrous wars. Italian politicians recommend an understanding between the Latin and Sclavonic nations as a counterpoise to the Bismarck-Andrassy partnership. If this advice is followed a long step will have been taken toward the precipitation of the general European conflict so long expected.

DR. FISCHER, of the imperial German postoffice, has just published a pamphlet showing the comparative postal and telegraph statistics. The letter post of the whole world for 1873 amounted in round numbers to 3,300,000,000 letters, or about 9,250,000 daily; and the numbers have been increasing daily at an astonishing rate. Thus in Japan the number of postoffices in 1872 was 1,179, and in 1876 it had risen to 3,649. The number of separate articles which passed through the Japanese post in 1878 was 47,000,000, of which 25,000,000 were letters, 10,000,000 post cards and 9,500,000 newspapers. Post cards were first brought into use only in 1865, and now they are employed in almost every country of the world. The parcels post has, however, not yet got beyond the first stage of its development. The number of telegraphic dispatches sent in 1877 amounted for the whole globe to nearly 130,000,000, or an average of 353,000 daily.

THE following instance illustrates the evil working of the present English system of land management: The village of Everton twelve years ago was one of the most prosperous in the county. The farms, eight in number, were let to well-to-do tenants, most of whom were born upon the soil they cultivated. But since then there has been a total change both in landlords and tenants. Some years ago, when the land-hunger was its height, the estate, comprising 1,700 acres, was sold; all the old tenants were evicted; the land was let to strangers at an advanced rental, and an entirely new system of management was inaugurated by the gentleman who took the management of the estate. The farms were not long occupied. The advanced rent, like the last straw, made itself felt, and tenant after tenant found himself obliged to give up his holding; they were succeeded in some cases by other tenants who, like their predecessors, eventually succumbed, until at last the village has become almost deserted by farmers. Seven farm-houses are unoccupied by farmers, one or two are shut up, and the others are occupied by either bailiffs or laborers. The whole of the land, with the exception of one farm and some garden-land, is in the hands of the estate agent, who is carrying on the cultivation at the expense of the landlord. The landlords used to clear £3,000 a year from this estate, but for the last four years they have lost £3,000 a year.

Toads in Trees and Stones.

A large toad was found a few years ago in an old apple tree at Wonham Manor; it came to light when the tree was blown down. The "Memoires" of the French Academie des Sciences" contain a description of a live toad found in the heart of an old elm tree. Near Nantes, when an old oak was cleft open, a toad was found in the very heart-wood, although no crevice or other channel of entrance could be detected; there were about ninety rings in the trunk of this oak, leading to the inference (according to one theory) that the animal must have been in his prison-house ninety years. Mr. Jesse, in reference to a frog found in the trunk of a mulberry-tree, expressed a belief that the annual rings had been gradually but surely inclosing the reptile. Toads in clay have been more frequently met with than in trees; sometimes a whole family have been thus ferreted out at once. In 1856 a toad was found at a considerable depth at Benthall, near Brosely, Shropshire. Mr. Bathurst, earthenware manufacturer at Benthall, ascertained that the creature was met with about six feet beneath the surface, in a layer of tough clay customarily used for making coarse brown ware. Above this layer, in successive strata, were ferruginous coal of poor quality, clay, a loam of clay and gravel, and meadow-turf at the top. The toad was found filling a cavity as wax does a seal. A minute examination of the superincumbent strata failed to detect any fissure through which the animal could have entered. The light of day seemed at first to distress it, but this it soon became accustomed to; the eyes were brilliant, the skin moist, the mouth quite closed.—Chambers' Journal.

A Wonderful Story of Brook Trout.

In the Bee, a busy little paper that improves each shining hour in Sacramento, Cal., to gather the very honey of the news, there one day in the last month appeared a story about some brook trout. The Bee got the story from Mr. Redding, who is paid by the State to take care of all good fish. Mr. Redding says that at the foot of Mount Shasta, near the Sacramento river, he made a small pond in which to hatch trout. The water ran into the pond through a spout (or, as he calls it, "flume"), and this spout was built for a long distance to a spring on the mountain side. The spout crosses a deep glen when about 200 feet from the pond, and in the bottom of the glen runs a free stream of water that empties into the river. Now one sunny day Mr. Redding saw several trout swim out of the pond and into the spout, which is not covered. There was water enough in the spout for the fish to swim in by hard work. Mr. Redding watched the little fellows until they reached the part of the spout that was over the deep glen. When they reached that point they jumped over the side of spout and dropped into the water below, swimming thence into the river. He watched fourteen fish do the trick in one day. Every one of them made the jump in safety. It is strange that the fish should have known just where to jump at, for had they attempted to leap from the spout at any other point they would have been killed by falling on the rocks.

UPON a modest gravestone in Vincennes Cemetery appears the plaintive legend, "His neighbor played the cornet."

AGRICULTURAL.

November Work on the Farm.

(From the American Agriculturist.)

FENCES and gates of the orchard and nursery should be in good order, especially at this season, when a stray animal may do serious damage.

DRAINING, if necessary, should be done before hard freezing weather. Surface water should not be allowed to collect; a few furrows in the right place will be useful in carrying off the water.

PLOWING the corn-stubble should be made the first business of this month. In fact, the plowing under or otherwise disposing of all rubbish from gathered crops should be done as soon as possible.

REGULAR rations are absolutely necessary. Steady feed means steady thrift and profit. Scarcely any two animals have the same appetites. In feeding, observe closely and know the habits of each animal; the winter is the time for this study.

CIONS may be cut as soon as the leaves fall, when they should be put in sawdust, or, in its absence, sand, and kept in a cool cellar. Only healthy, thrifty trees of well-known varieties should be selected from. It is better [illegible] buy them to use poor stock.

A MOUND of earth at the base of young trees will serve the double purpose of a support to the tree against the winds and storms, and also prevent mice from gnawing the trunks and killing the trees. The mounds should be eighteen or twenty inches high, and of earth free from weeds, so that it may pack firmly.

APPLES.—With the present short crop, fruit that in years of abundance would not be thought marketable will sell, and should be sorted with this in view, and put up in the best possible shape. The rejected fruit can go into cider, which is better when made at this season, because the process of fermentation goes on more slowly.

THE chinch bug has been unusually destructive the past season. Its winter harbors are in the stubbles, and any standing weeds that remain in the fields. Doubtless the ravages of this pest are encouraged by the safe shelter it finds in this way. Wheat farmers may take a hint from this, that cleaner culture may be found an effective method of destroying this and other pests, by depriving them of winter quarters.

WINTER FEEDING FOR COWS.—The yield of milk and butter in the summer depends greatly upon the winter feeding. All the feed given to cows is not consumed without return. The manure gives a good dividend upon the outlay, and the animals are storing up energy and strength to be made available afterward. The winter is the season for liberal and judicious feeding, and not for "short commons," which is but another term for half starvation.

RABBITS can do much harm if left to themselves. If the trees are few, they may be protected by bands of lath or tarred paper, tied on with fine wire. Rabbits have a great distaste for meat, and may be kept away from the roots by smearing the trunks of the trees with blood, or rubbing them with liver or other refuse meat. A small "bounty" on rabbits will make boys active with their traps. The rabbit is at its best in November, and a fat young one is most excellent.

FENCES AND DITCHES.—Before the ground freezes, put fences and ditches in good order. Fence-posts that are loose may be tamped solidly, and a stone rammed on each side will steady a post better than packing with earth. Mounding up around the posts will turn the water from them and save them from heaving. The weeds that have grown in the ditches, and the accumulations of leaves and rubbish, should not be left in them; remove all such and make a clear channel for the water to flow away.

COWS.—Dairymen have reason to hope for better things. An advance of 100 per cent. on cheese, and 25 per cent. on butter, is cheering, although, unfortunately, the dealers get all the benefit of it at present. The dairymen, however, will have the advantage in the future, and this will be an incentive to improve the condition of the cows. Winter dairying is a profitable business, and the best dairymen are gradually working into it, but it will be only the first-class dairymen who will succeed in it.

GREEN manuring is one of the cheapest and easiest methods of fertilizing land. A stubble plowed early this month may be sown with rye, at a cost of less than $2 per acre, and the rye may be plowed under in the spring, April or May, and the ground sown with another crop. Otherwise the rye may be cut for fodder, and the ground used for oats. But an occasional green crop plowed in will be found very useful in keeping up land, and rye is the only one that can be used at this season.

DEEP DRAINS.—Making drains is especially a work for this season. If a field, or part of one, or a low piece of land is properly drained each year, by-and-by the whole farm will be put into good condition. Patience and time are especially needed in farm work. One cannot do everything in one year, nor in ten, in many cases, so that a farmer should not be discouraged, if he cannot do all that he desires in one or two seasons. If what is done is completed, as far as it goes, one should be satisfied.

ROOTS AFTER CORN.—A badly-plowed corn-stubble is the worst possible ground for roots, and, if these are to be grown next season, and corn-stubble is to be plowed first, it must be plowed deeply, and all the corn-stubs well covered. Root culture requires good farming, and rough, uneven plowing, with loose corn-stubs on the surface, is not good farming. A well-plowed corn-stubble may be worked with the disk-harrow in the spring, and well fitted for roots, which are preferable to oats to follow corn.

THERE is a popular brewery in Munich called the Hofbrauhaus—"court brewery—in which noble and plebeian mingle freely, the best of lager, like the cold hand of death, rendering all equal. The quantity of beer they imbibe may be judged from the recent observations of a visitor, as recorded in a German newspaper. At 10:35 in the forenoon, two fresh hogsheads were tapped. One of them was empty at 10:48 and the other at 10:51. This would be about 1,000 glasses sold in sixteen minutes.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

BANANA ICE CREAM.—Take eight ripe bananas, pound them into a pulp, then beat them thoroughly with one quart of cream. Sweeten and freeze the same as ordinary cream. They may also be grated or finely chopped.

TOMATO SAUCE.—Take eight ripe tomatoes; cut them up, skins and all, and stew them until they are very soft; press them through a sieve; season with salt and cayenne pepper. Add five table-spoonfuls of brown gravy; stir it all well together, and heat it.

TOMATO PASTE FOR SOUP.—Skin the tomatoes, and stew them quite dry; then put them upon china plates, and put them in the sun to dry. When dried into a paste, put it into jars, and tie them down. This can be kept all winter, if put in a cool, dry place.

FRIED TOMATOES.—Take stewed tomatoes well seasoned; add to them sufficient fine bread crumbs to enable you to form into cakes; fry in butter to a light brown. Fresh tomatoes, sliced and rolled in fine crumbs (first salting them), fried in the same manner, are very nice.

SUET PUDDING.—One cup brown sugar, one cup milk, one cup raisins, one cup suet; flour sufficient for a thick batter; if sour milk is used, one teaspoon soda; if sweet milk, two teaspoons baking-powder; put in a two-quart basin and steam three hours; both suet and raisins are to be chopped fine.

CHEAP SALAD DRESSING.—One egg, well stirred with one teaspoonful of mixed mustard and one of salt, two-thirds of a cup of vinegar, one cup of fresh cream, one table-spoonful of butter. Heat slowly, stirring constantly, till it comes to a boil. Make it in the morning, that it may be perfectly cold when put on the lettuce.

BEEF BALLS.—Chop very fine two pounds of raw beef (off the round is best) and one-fourth pound of suet; mix with it a handful of flour; seaso to taste with salt, black pepper and cloves; mold into balls or cakes (a little thicker than codfish cakes), and fry in suet or drippings until a nice brown on both sides, keeping the cover on all the time.

TO PICKLE ONIONS.—Select small silver-skinned onions. After taking off the outside skin remove with a knife one more skin, when each onion should look quite clear. Put them into strong brine for three days. Bring vinegar to boil with one or two blades of mace and some whole red peppers. Pour it hot over the onions, well drained from the brine.

SICK-ROOM COOKERY—SAVORY CUSTARD.—Take the yelks of two eggs, and the white of one, and put in a small basin; add one gill of beef-tea and a quarter of a saltspoonful of salt; whip up the eggs and the beef-tea; take a small cup, which will hold the mixture and butter it; take a piece of white letter-paper, and butter that, and tie it on the cup; have a saucepan, with ho water, and put it on the fire to boil when the water is boiling put in the cup, so that the water stands below the top of the cup; let it simmer fiftee minutes; serve hot.

Edwin Forrest's Chivalry.

The manly elements of Mr. Forrest' character made him at all times the ready champion of the weak and defenseless. He was especially chivalrou in his conduct to women. This on instance is a sample: He was returning from New York after a successfu engagement in that city, and seated opposite him in the car were two young ladies. They were traveling withou male escort. When the cars stopped at Newark a person entered and took a seat immediately back of the ladies.

He was of the loud class, full of paste jewelry, impudence and bad manners. The latter was soon painfully apparent with reference to the ladies. He indulged in offensive language, and seemed to think the whole matter was a good joke. In a short time the language and the conduct of the man and the evident distress of the ladies arrested the attention of Mr. Forrest. He left his seat and, facing the obnoxious passenger, said:

"Will you please vacate your seat? You are offensive to these ladies."

"Guess not," replied the man, with the coarse and rude expression of a bully and a ruffian; "I have paid for my ticket, and will sit where I please."

"But," answered Mr. Forrest, and the color mounted to his cheeks, "your ticket does not give you the right to insult ladies. That you have done, and I will give you five minutes to vacate the seat and the car. If you prefer to leave both by the window, remain, and you can be accommodated."

Mr. Forrest then drew his watch from his pocket and buttoned his coat. The ruffian took another glance at the determined eye and stalwart frame of his opponent, and with murmured threats of vengeance left the car. The ladies had no further annoyance from him.

This is an authentic anecdote of one whose whole life was, in many respects, a romance.

IN Switzerland there were, this season, 1,400,000 travelers, according to the Geneva Journal, a larger number than has been registered in four years. The number of English travelers has decreased, while that of Russian and German has increased. It is estimated that 200 francs is the average sum spent by each traveler; therefore, there must be about 280,000,000 francs disbursed in Switzerland yearly by travelers. The Times says that English travelers alone have this year spent over 46,000,000 francs there.

ACCORDING to an official report 160 Turkish mosques and holy schools were destroyed in Roumelia and Bulgaria during the Russian occupation of these provinces; and about the same number of mosques and schools have been destroyed since the Russians left.

THE HOME DOCTOR.

SURE AND SIMPLE CURE FOR WARTS.—I will send you a recipe for curing warts, which I have tried and know it to be a sure cure. Procure a wild turnip out of the woods, cut a piece of it off and rub the inside of it on the wart a few times, and in a short time the wart will be gone and will not leave any scar at all. If the wart is large and raw it will be a little sore. I had nearly a hundred warts on my hands, and I put on the turnip and they are entirely gone. Try it, one and all.—From an interested reader of the "Home" department.

CURE OF SCIATICA AND NEURALGIA.—Dr. Ebrard, of Nimes, states that he has for many years treated all his cases of sciatica and neuralgic pains with an approved apparatus, consisting merely of a flat-iron and vinegar, two things that will be found in every house. The iron is heated until sufficiently hot to vaporize the vinegar, and is then covered with some woolen fabric, which is moistened with vinegar, and the apparatus is applied at once to the painful part. The application may be repeated two or three times a day. Dr. Ebrard states that as a rule pain disappears in twenty-four hours, and recovery ensues at once.

REMEDIES FOR HICCOUGH.—According to the Lyon Medicale, Dr. Grellety has observed that hiccough in children was immediately stopped by giving them a lump of sugar saturated with table vinegar. The same remedy was tried on adults with similar instantaneous success. Another remedy, which may be considered even more handy, was mentioned by a Russian priest to a lady, and has always proved very efficacious. It consists in simply looking fixedly, for about five minutes, at the blade of an open penknife, without either speaking or laughing. The remedy has been tried innumerable times, and has never proved unsuccessful.

A GOOD CURE FOR CATARRH.—A good cure for catarrh is crushed cubeb berries smoked in a pipe, emitting the smoke through the nose. After a few trials this will be easy to do. If the nose is stopped up so that it is almost impossible to breathe, one pipeful will ering, thick, indented tongue tells of previous excesses; and I do not like my friends to wear such tongues, for I sincerely believe that real comfort cannot be secured in this world by any one who does not keep his feet warm, his head cool, and his tongue clean.

Pompeii.

In a recent lecture Rev. Henry G. Spaulding said that in 1748 the spade of a Spanish engineer first struck upon the buried ruins of the city. The city was buried at a depth of from twenty-three to twenty-six feet of ashes and volcanic mud. The lower half of the deposit consisted of dry ashes and small stones or scoriæ. Then comes about ten feet of volcanic mud. This was caused by the heavy vapor of steam in the atmosphere, which converted the showers of ashes as they fell into a plastic mass. Above this mud are the scoriæ and ashes of later eruptions, and the soil which has accumulated upon the surface. Nothing, or very little, was burned in Pompeii. The heat was not sufficient to change the colors of the frescoes on the walls, and the woodwork was carbonized by its long intombment in such a soil. The lecturer defended the city against the charge so commonly made that it was an immoral and vicious city. It was a city of art and culture, and was inhabited by men of wealth and rare taste. If our modern American cities were to be blotted out as Pompeii was blotted out, the future discoverer would find beneath their ruins evidences of vice and licentiousness to which Pompeii can give but little comparison.

A Trim Appearance.

No woman can give a satisfactory excuse for personal untidiness. Household work, of whatever kind, does not interfere with having a clean dress on, however common, a nice, plain collar, and a smooth head of hair. There is all the difference in the world in different housewives in this respect. Some always look bright and "smart;" but others never look decently clean in the mornings; they seem to have no idea that anybody ever notices their personal appearance while engaged in their household duties, or that it is a matter of the least possible concern to anybody. They forget that they have a husband, who was won when they were in full dress, and studied to attract him by an addition it gave to their persons without regard to the time and trouble it required—whose eye is as sharp now as it ever was, and whose sensibilities are just as acute. The children, too—especially the girls—what a sad example to them is slovenliness on the part of their mother!

HOUSE-BUILDING has been more active in Paris this year than has been known since the war. The number of new houses is 658, comprising 2,615 stories. Rents, nevertheless, keep up at the figure reached last year, in consequence of the Exposition.

IN Italy the idea is daily gaining ground that Prince Bismarck has firmly made up his mind to cheat Italy and the Liberal party at large by making peace with the Pope and allying himself with Austria, in order ultimately to steal Trieste for Germany.

A RECENT discovery at Pompeii was that of a birdseller's house. The imbedded skeletons of numerous birds were dug out; also, large quantities of carbonized millet seed, hemp seed and a species of small bean, which had been the dealer's stock of bird food.

A FEW days ago the Indians along Passamaquoddy bay, Me., chose their Governor and subordinate officers. The installation took place the evening of the election, the ceremonies beginning by each Indian placing a spot of red paint on his forehead. There were a variety of dances in which no squaw was permitted to have a male partner, plenty of singing, an address, and an immense feast.

A LIVE frog was found in the center of a solid stone, quarried out at the State prison, in Carson, Nev. He was in a little round cavity three inches in diameter. He was a good-sized frog and a little lighter than the natural color. When his shell was broken into he blinked and shut his eyes, lying flat on his belly as if stunned. Afterward he roused up and jumped about a little, but died in a few minutes.

THE American Isabella grape planted in Wurtemberg, Germany, grows with extraordinary luxuriance, and during the present season, in which the German vineyards are generally in a rather poor condition, this is about the only vine that bears abundant fruit. The United States send cheese and beef to England, and grapes and lager beer to Germany. It remains now that they should furnish wine to France.

A PARIS omnibus, one of the very large three-horsed kind, recently broke exactly into two pieces. The first half went off with the driver, who was unconscious of what had happened. The hind part remained poised on its two wheels—it is not said how long—but all the passengers had time to get down. Fortunately there were but few. Only one was seated in the exact middle of the vehicle, an old lady, who, when the division of the omnibus occurred, was deposited somewhat suddenly on the pavement.

HORACE WEDGE, of Long Hill, Bridgeport, Ct., went out shooting, recently, and returned at night after a tramp covering several miles of ground. After his return home, he put his hand in his pocket for his watch, and found it was missing. That or the following night he dreamed that he saw his watch lying near a beech tree in a run east of Long Hill, where they killed a couple of birds, and so vivid was the dream that the following day he resolved to go and look for the watch. He found the tree he saw in his dream without difficulty, and, lying near it, just as he pictured in his dream, he found the missing watch, safe and sound.

A Birth in India.

In India, before the birth of her first child, the wife, often not more than 13 or 14 years of age, is placed in a palanquin and borne in triumph, accompanied by music, to her father's house, and at every street corner she passes in her progress a cocoanut must be broken and abandoned to propitiate the ever-present demons. Numerous ceremonies attend the advent of the infant, which must be washed, clothed and fed in a peculiar manner. Its ears, nose and head are pressed and pulled, with a view to improve its personal appearance and bring it good luck, and it is laid to sleep with a pen-knife and small coin, endowed with some highly occult significance, under its pillow. The mother is treated with great care and kindness, but, as etiquette forbids a doctor to be called until those around her recognize that her life is in extreme danger, it is not surprising that he often arrives on the scene too late to save his patient.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, NOV. 13, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY
EDITORS.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

"NO SOLID SOUTH, NO SOLID NORTH, BUT A SOLID UNION."

Hon. Joseph E. McDonald has indicated that he would consent to the use of his name as a candidate for governor, if the democracy of the state demanded it.

The Evansville Courier says: Judge Lowry, of Allen county, would make a strong candidate for governor, and a most excellent officer.—Fort Wayne Sentinel.

The Indianapolis Democrat is strongly in favor of Wm. H. English, as the democratic candidate for president. The same paper supports Col. Gray for governor.

Should the mischievous leaders of the republican party suceed in electing Grant president in 1880, the people can look forward to the great event when his head shall be measured for a crown.

The COURIER persists in slandering and defaming soldiers in general.—Republican.

Every SOLDIER in the county knows better, R. H. Weamer to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Republican of last week names our fellow townsman, Mr. Nicholas Ensley, for treasurer of state on the republican ticket. We fear a republican boom from that quarter will have little effect, though if we were compelled to vote for a republican, we would take pleasure in supporting Mr. Ensley.

Democrats who are advocating the nomination of Hon. Thomas F. Bayard for president should bear in mind that he advocated the adoption of the electoral commission bill, and that he was a member of the electoral commission. We might suggest other good reasons why he would not make a strong candidate.

The Very Best of Republican Authority.

We appeal to every honest, fair-minded, Union-loving republican in DeKalb county, to lay aside party prejudice just long enough to read and fairly consider the following extract from an editorial in last weeks Harper's Weekly. In a lengthy editorial concerning the probable results of the New York election, the Weekly says:

"If the republicans should succeed by a plurality only, the result next year would still remain doubtful, but a clear republican majority over both the democratic candidates would not only place New York among the republican states next year, but it should put an end to the un-American and mischievous talk about a 'strong man,' which has fired so much of the eloquence of the campaign. Have we really reached a condition in which the party of the intelligence, patriotism, and industry of the country, victorious in the field and successful at the polls, must betake itself to the overthrow of the constitution to maintain the rights and liberties of American citizens? This is the only meaning of the demand of a 'strong man.' In the sense in which the phrase is used there is no place for him in our popular system of government. A 'strong man' in the current phrase means a soldier. But our government is civil, not military. A military president can do nothing except in strict obedience to law, and to demand a soldier for the presidency because he is a soldier, is to doubt and discredit the American principle and the American government. It is possible that General Grant, to whom all this kind of talk points, may be the real choice of the republican party for the presidency. But if it should select him, because he is, in the common phrase, a 'strong man,' and not because he is resolutely obedient to law, it would betray its own principles and traditions. For any possible exigency that can arise, Mr. Sherman, or Mr. Blaine, or Mr. Washburne, or any other civilian, would be just as 'strong' a man as General Grant. Happily he has never shown any disposition to play the 'strong man's' part, and it is a national disgrace that eminent republican leaders should have broadly hinted a role suited to an Asiatic prince or a Norman barbarian; but not to an American president."

Now, we want to ask our republican friends, if there is not some danger of "the overthrow of the Constitution" should the republican leaders succeed in electing a "strong man", when such papers as Harper's Weekly become alarmed? Every reading man in this broad land, and almost every schoolboy knows with what zeal the Harpers have for many years supported the republican party; and all, will acknowledge that Nast's cartoons which have appeared week after week for years in Harper's Weekly have done more for the republican party than any dozen republican newspapers in the land. It will not do to say that Harper's Weekly is not good authority, nor that its editor is not advised as to the desires of republican leaders; it is no milk and water journal nor never was; on the other hand, it has always advocated radicalism of the most radical character. It now fearlessly asserts that "IT IS A NATIONAL DISGRACE THAT EMINENT REPUBLICAN LEADERS SHOULD HAVE BROADLY HINTED A ROLE SUITED TO AN ASIATIC PRINCE OR A NORMAN BARBARIAN." Is it any wonder that democratic newspapers are sounding an alarm and charging republican leaders with conspiracy against the rights and liberties of Americans? Who, now, are traitors to their country?

Teachers' Institute.

MONDAY, NOV. 10TH, 1879.

The DeKalb county teachers' institute convened at Garrett, at 10 o'clock a. m., and was called to order by Superintendent MacIntosh. Mr. T. J. Saxton of Auburn, was elected secretary, after which the regular exercises were commenced.

Prof. C. A. Fike, of Butler, conducted a class in grammar, proving his ability to master that branch of study. Having finished the exercises in grammar, the teachers indulged in a little recreation by way of vocal music, led by Mr. J. S. Otis assisted by Miss Nettie Rowe at the organ. Prof. Otis then took up the subject of mental arithmetic and entertained the members with remarks both interesting and instructive. Superintendent MacIntosh was next, with a subject of no little importance—that of penmanship; his ideas and suggestions were worthy of consideration by every one present; as there is probably no branch so much neglected by teachers, and none of more importance in our common schools. Mr. T. H. Shoub was then called upon to offer some remarks concerning geography, and the importance of map drawing in public schools, subjects he is well qualified to discuss. Dr. Sherman, of Garrett, by request of Superintendent MacIntosh, offered some very appropriate suggestions concerning the building and ventilation of school rooms, the importance of which is so frequently overlooked by school officers. His remarks were extemporaneous, or nearly so, and proved conclusively that physiology and hygiene are subjects with which he is familiar. Mr. Clark, the trustee of Keyser township, was present and will no doubt take advantage of the suggestions made by the doctor when he has occasion to construct new school buildings. In this connection it occurs to the writer that the law compelling teachers to attend township institutes might be appropriately amended so as to compel school officers to attend county institutes.

THE Comptroller of the Curren says the increase in the national-bank circul tion for October was about $3,000,000.

THERE is a rumor at Washington th the English mission has been tendered to President Woolley, of Yale College.

AS A mark of respect to the memo of the late Senator Chandler, the Preside issued an order directing that the several E ecutive Departments be closed to public bu ness, and their flags and those of their depen encies throughout the country be displayed half-mast on the day of his funeral.

Institute convened at 9 o'clock a. m. Rev. Madden read from the scriptures and opened the institute with prayer.

The next on the programme was a recitation in grammar conducted by Prof. C. A. Fike. Harvey's was the recognized authority.

Prof. Otis, of Garrett, delivered an address on arithmetic, as applied to business calculations.

Miss Daniels of the Auburn schools addressed the institute on vocal tones, select reading and gymnastic exercises. Her remarks were both interesting and profitable. At the close of Miss Daniels' address, the superintendent offered some good suggestions upon the same subject. Institute then adjourned for dinner, after which Supt. MacIntosh conducted a recitation in orthography, which was highly spoken of. Miss Ella E. Shoub followed with remarks on geography. Remarks concerning primary arithmetic by Miss Zeigler were followed by a general discussion on the same subject. After considerable discussion concerning the general management of schools, the institute adjourned until Wednesday morning.

Names registered on Tuesday:

The balance of the proceedings will be given next week.

Mr. Tilden's political funeral has been indefinitely postponed. The old gentleman has entirely too much life to make a successful corpse.—Fort Wayne Sentinel.

Democrats would prefer to attend his funeral now, rather than after the campaign of 1880.

Since the New York election it is generally conceded that Indiana and New York must furnish the democratic candidates for president and vice-president, and Hendricks and Potter seem to have the lead. The Cincinnati Enquirer presents the claims of the gentlemen named in a lengthy editorial, without indicating which should be placed at the head of the ticket. We give below the closing paragraph of the Enquirer article;

"Should these distinguished democrats be nominated, it is a matter for future discussion whether the ticket shall read Potter and Hendricks or Hendricks and Potter. We are now simply engaged in getting out raw material. If the states are to be considered in the order of their importance, then Potter's claims seem to surpass those of Hendricks; if the nominations go by rules of personal promotion, then Hendricks marches to the front. Potter's political achievments are the latest, but Hendricks has the longest standing as a patriotic democrat. Potter has been a champion of the democrats in attacking the republicans for their 'counting in' tricks in 1876; but Hendricks was himself one of the 'counted out.'"

Special Announcement.

We take pleasure in announcing that we have made arrangements with the publishers of the STATE SENTINEL which enable us to make the following very liberal offer:

To all persons who pay their subscription account to date, we will send the COURIER and WEEKLY SENTINEL one year for $2.50 in advance. In addition to this we will make each subscriber a present of "THE LAW OF THE FARM," by Jas. B. McCreilis, of the Indiana bar. This valuable phamphlet ought to be in the hands of every farmer in the state. The work embraces the following subjects:

1st. How to buy a farm.
2nd. How far the farm extends, or its proper boundaries.
3rd What the deed of a farm includes.
4th The farmer's rights in the road.

The INDIANA WEEKLY STATE SENTINEL is an eight-page paper, (the same as the COURIER) and will contain a supplement of two additional pages about half of the time. It is the recognized organ of the democracy of Indiana, and will always be found full of news of a general character. Its editorials present strong argument in favor of economy and against class legislation, and its agricultural department is adapted to the wants of every farmer.

Remember that the $2.50 must be paid in advance, and the COURIER subscription account must be paid to date, in order to secure this liberal offer. tf.

Newville.

—The weather is fine, now that the winter is over, and Indian summer is with us again.

—A gentleman over the river handed us a very nice little advertisement to be inserted as a news item, but we respectfully declined it.

—John W. Miller and others are putting up a nice little building to be used as a harness shop.

—When we want news items, we will try to find them without any assistance from others who seek to advertise their business free gratis.

—The people are still busy getting in their corn, while some are running around buying up apples and packing them for shipment.

—The Bourbon Mirror states that an illicit still, of 300 gallons capacity, has been found within two squares of the White House, at Washington. This may be news to the Mirror, but it isn't to the president, probably, nor the Grant administration. We would suggest that a smaller one would answer now, as Grant is away and Zach. Chandler is dead; as to the distance from the White House, perhaps this is not any too close, as it saves time, and "time is money."

—The republicans are crowing over the late election in the state of New York and New Jersey in order to induce those who never read anything but the republican county paper, and not often that, to think that they have gained a great victory. Well, forty-five thousand in New York is quite a victory, but, unfortunately for them, it is on the wrong side, as will be shown next year.

Good Management in Life Insurance

The official returns for 1878 show that many of the life insurance companies are remarkably well managed. The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York ranks first, as regards amount paid for expenses, losses and taxes to each one hundred dollars of premium receipts being only $39.33.

The Union Central Life Insurance Company of Cincinnati ranks second, they having paid $39.98 to each one hundred dollars of premium receipts. The small amount of loss sustained by the late failures is remarkable when the total amount invested in the companies is considered. Mr. Thos. H. Sprott, Auburn Ind., represents this company.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Ashma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, will full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y. 42-eow-6m.

—The floor-managers of the Neoteric Club authorize us to say that the music will be "cut loose" at 8 o'clock, and request all to be present at that time.

—The Ligonier Banner wants the girls to organize a "cooking club" in that burg. We'll bet they don't get it without offering large prizes to the members.

—A close inspection, and careful perusal of the almanac for 1880, prompts us to state that the next New Year's day will come some time in January of that year.

—The county commissioners are now busily engaged in looking after the construction of ditches. The new member of the board, Mr. Kelham, makes a full hand.

—Charley Emanuel packs his grip-sack and steals away to Antwerp quite numerously of late, and an excited community demands that he shall rise and explain.

—Postmaster Rainier wanted to take in the reception at Chicago yesterday, but was too busy; so he made a martyr of himself, practiced self-denial, and stayed "to hum."

—A. T. Austin, of Wabash, who bosses the branch store of W. J. Austin & Co. at that place, arrived in town yesterday and will spend a few days with his brother, W. J.

—Lute Wright and Obe Cool are putting up machinery with which to carry on hay packing this winter. This is a good scheme, and they are just the fellows to make it pay.

—The largest invoice of ruching, laces, lace ties, handkerchiefs, ladies' merino vests, notions, etc., ever brought to this place, at N. Ensley & Co's, east side of public square. 46-2t.

—Everybody says that Ensley & Co., have the nicest line of misses' ulsters and hoods ever brought into town, having made 10 or 12 orders since the first. Go there to buy them. 46-2t.

—Seventeen persons boarded the train at the Saginaw depot last Tuesday, it being the excursion train to Chicago, where Grant displayed himself to the crowd yesterday.

—Pay up your back subscription and get the Courier one year, the Weekly Sentinel one year, and the "Law of the Farm," all for $2.50 in advance. Tell it to your friends.

—Fred. Clark, agent of the Wabash and Saginaw railroads, skipped up to Chicago Saturday night and back early Monday morning. Don't see how she could let him away so soon.

—Thanksgiving evening is the time fixed for the Masonic festival at Garrett. Rev. H. J. Norris, Rev. T. E. Madden and Mr. E. D Hartman, have been invited to address the fraternity.

—If you have nice goods for the holidays, or intend to have in due season, tell the people so in the columns of the Courier, which has the largest circulation of any paper in the county.

—The up-side-down boot man, W. J. Austin, says that business has been boomin' for several weeks past, but that yesterday was "duller'n the"—just supply any word that suits your taste.

—Conductor Covert, of the Jackson road, resumes his old run this week. He has been running the night train for some time past, with no sleep to speak of, and it has about laid him on the shelf.

—"Five years in the south, and what I saw there," was the subject of a lecture delivered at the M. E. church, in Garrett, on Monday evening last. The proceeds were donated to the church.

—Have you ever noticed Tom. Sprott's sign—or rather, Sprott & Wood's? Probably not. Next time you pass their law and insurance shop put on your spec's and hunt for it. Then laugh.

—During a brief stay at Garrett on yesterday, we had the pleasure of an acquaintance with Mr. Wm. Lore, superintendent of the B. & O. carpenter shop. Mr. L. appears to be very much of a gentleman.

—Mike Long throws in an extra yard with every whole bolt of brown muslin he sells, which accounts for his popularity among the ladies. If he should happen to forget it, don't be afraid to jog his memory.

—The M. E. Society will meet at the M. E. parsonage on Wednesday afternoon and evening. Refreshments at the usual hour. An invitation is extended to all.

Mrs. Anderson, Sec'y.

—Martin L. Roth, for some time past a resident of the far west, is again in Auburn, whither he came to attend the funeral of his brother Milton, last Tuesday. He has apparently been much benefited in health.

—Uncle Tom Gross says the Central hotel is doing better now than for some time past. The Central is a good house, and the rates are more moderate than those of similar hotels in towns even smaller than Auburn.

—A brakeman on the B. & O. railroad, named Charley Bapp, was killed last Monday night at Fostoria, Ohio, 90 miles east. He was married and lived at Garrett, but we have been unable to learn further particulars.

—Mr. S. D. Mason, late cashier of the Eel-river railroad, has accepted a position on the Chicago & Northwestern, at St. Paul, Minn. No man ever connected with the Eel-river road has more friends along the line than Mr. Mason.

—There isn't a good vacant house in Auburn. This speaks well for the town, but it's rather hard for those who have not where to lay their heads. If the writer could only secure a comfortable wood-shed, he wood shed no more tears.

—There will be no adjourned term of circuit court on the 17th inst., as heretofore announced, owing to a decision of Judge Lowry that an adjourned term cannot be legally held at the time named, under the act creating the new district.

—It rains potato-peelings occasionally in Auburn. The particular shower alluded to occurred last Monday and confined itself exclusively to north Jackson street; and the fellow who got caught in it swore like a canal-boatman. It came up very unexpectedly over a tight-board fence.

—Misses May Rhodenbaugh and Nellie Wheelock were this week soliciting subscriptions for the purchase of a carpet to be laid in the Good Templars' hall. Their mission was a worthy one, and we trust they met with liberal responses from those visited.

—The new little peanut-stand, down on the corner, presided over and controlled by Uncle John McClellan, is adorned with a big sign which informs the people that therein can be found "choice groceries, candies, cigars and tobacco." Exclusively retail.

—It is quite probable that more of our people would have attended Grant's show at Chicago yesterday if it were not for the presence of Georgie Hazzard in this country. He still lurks around and "makes it pleasant for the boys" when they venture outside of the corporation.

—Mr. H. C. Bell still retains his position on the Eel-river division of the Wabash railway. He is well pleased with the new management, and we know the new management is well pleased with him, for he is acknowledged to be one of the best roadmasters in the country.

—Rev. C. A. Russell, Indiana Sunday-school missionary, and Rev. E. B. Edmunds, Michigan Sunday-school missionary, will hold a meeting at the Baptist church in this place next Tuesday evening, November 18th. Exercises will consist of addresses, music, etc. All are cordially invited.

Married.—At the residence of Mr. John Weaver, by Rev. H Johnson, on Tuesday evening, Nov. 11, 1879, George Clark and Maggie Willard.

The above notice will no doubt surprise many of Mr. Clark's most intimate friends, and if he is not voted a sly old coon, then we miss our guess.

—Go to Ensley & Co's., east of the public square, for millinery and fancy goods. Their stock is the largest in the county, and they now sell cheaper than ever, as trade is increasing rapidly and they are buying new goods every week. Go and see their goods before buying.

—An indignant bluffer from the backwoods went into Austin's big boot and shoe store last evening, determined to have refunded the money he invested in a pair of stoga boots, a few months ago, or spill ber-lud. He got no money, however, neither did he scatter any gore, but he got—left.

—Prof. M. McClinton, from Mansfield, O., is in town this week, canvassing for a class in writing. He will probably be ready to open in the north school building by Friday (to-morrow) evening, and we bespeak for him a large attendance, having examined his specimens and testimonials from other places where he has taught, at all of which he has given entire satisfaction.

—Tom Mays and Wm. Dills exchanged a few highly impassioned sentences, last Tuesday, down on Hollister's corner. It was occasioned by some misunderstanding in regard to the subscription for Prof. Clarke's lectures, and for a time things looked like war; fortunately, though, it terminated without muscular violence, and all is now serene.

—Our attention has been called to the malicious conduct of certain boys in Auburn, who make a practice of throwing stones through the windows of the public school building. A reward is offered for the guilty parties. The school board cannot afford to purchase a box of glass every week to gratify the devilish disposition of reckless boys. Make an example of the first one caught.

—"The Tribulation of a Chinaman in China," is Jules Verne's latest and most popular book. It has been translated into English by Virginia Champlin, and is just published by Lee & Shepard, Boston, Mass. It embraces an interesting description of Chinese social life, is full of sparkling humor, and is a remarkably charming and instructive story. For sale by all book sellers.

—Anthony T. Dryer, of Fort Wayne, died last Monday morning at that place, of inflammation of the lungs. He was serving his second term in the council, from the eighth ward, having been re-elected last spring, and was an efficient officer. He had been married but about three weeks to Miss Catherine Wolf, of New Haven, Ind., at which place the funeral services were held, from the Catholic church, yesterday morning.

—Use Card's fever and ague cure and liver invigorator. For sale by F. E. Davenport and Casebeer & Matheny. 31-3m.

A Card of Thanks.

We, the undersigned, take this means of extending our sincere thanks to the many kind friends who extended to us their sympathies and aid in our late bereavement. Although strangers in the town, the friends came forward and showed the impulses of good hearts in doing all in their power to aid us. Again we say thanks.

W. C. Baker,
Della Baker.

—A communication in last week's Courier, concerning the unbecoming conduct of certain employes of the B. & O. railroad at Auburn Junction, had the desired effect. We are authorized by the officers of the road to say that no such conduct will be tolerated in or about the public offices of the road, in proof of which one E. P. Sands has been discharged from the junction office on account of profanity and conduct unbecoming a gentleman.

—The civil engineers on the Detroit extension of the Eel-river branch of the Wabash railway, arrived at Butler on Monday evening, and started back correcting the line on Tuesday morning. We understand that the road will be completed to Detroit within one year. We are also reliably informed that a branch will be built from Butler to Napoleon to connect with the main line. In the event that both lines are built, Auburn will have direct connection with both Toledo and Detroit.

—That communicated article in relation to the cussin' propensities of some of the B. & O. employes, which appeared last week, has "riled" some of the other boys at the junction, and it is due them, in right and justice, to state that it was not intended by the party who wrote it to reflect on those in the service of either the Wabash or Saginaw railroads, for he did not hear anything of that character from them; but it alluded particularly to a couple of B. & O. men, one of whom has since been discharged.

—The following list will enable our citizens to form some idea of the business transacted in the Auburn postoffice by Mr. Rainier and his assistant. During the first week in this month, official count shows that three thousand two hundred and ninety-two packages were sent through the mails from the Auburn office, of which 1547 were letters, 1691 second class matter, 44 third class matter and 10 fourth class matter.

—We listened with absorbing interest to Susan B. Anthony's lecture, "Woman Wants Bread," delivered at Valparaiso last Saturday night. Susan isn't any handsomer than of old, but she speaks her peculiar views with an earnestness that is of itself attractive, and she rarely ever fails to hold her audience well. Sunday she talked on temperance, and charged no admittance—only a contribution of ten cents at the door, that's all.

—Cupid stuck his little arrows around quite numerously last month, as a result of which, gaze on this list of individuals who have opened up a partnership in the matrimony business:

Alonzo Ludwig and Josephine Mergy; Jno. H. Becker and Kate Shaffer; Henry Maxwell and Lorane Jackson; Peter E. Fales and Rosa A. Handy; Murray A. Smith and Rosa A. Weiss; Albert Peters and Dora Damen; Chas. H. Dudgeon and Lavina Benninghoof; Thos. J. Marks and Elizabeth A. Griffith; Milo J. Calkin and Ella Borst; Daniel S Grogg and Mary E. Imler; Daniel K. Smith and Emeline Osborn; Hiram J. Scranton and Sarah A. Gillett; Jas. H Stough and Helen G. Parker; Wm. Brann and Delia Stroh; Isaac Reed and Libbie Johnson; John Wetoski and Magdalena Schott; John Duff and Lena Kroos; Wm. Hetty and Sadie A. Childs; Mahlon S. White and Charity Lung; Joshua R. Nichols and Emma Cochran.

A Reply to Taxpayer.

Editors Courier:—I noticed in your last issue, a communication signed "Taxpayer," wanting to know why the treasurer of DeKalb county had the door of the treasurer's office locked during business hours on the Tuesday before, while a number of persons were waiting on the outside to pay their taxes. Now permit me to say in reply, that the day referred to was just one day after the paying time had expired, and it is contrary to our statutes to take tax on said day. The law gives all tax payers until the first Monday in November to pay their tax; then the book must be turned over to the county auditor, unpaid tax extended, penalty added and the book returned to the treasurer's office, before he is in shape to receive tax again. The closing of the door has been made a practice for the convenience of the treasurer; my predecessors, Mr. Frank Ryan and Mr. Nicholas Ensley did the same and I have done so since I have had charge of the office, and expect to do so hereafter during the remainder of my term. Any person that is acquainted with the business of the treasurer's office during the last week in taxpaying time, certainly knows from the great rush of business from daylight till ten o'clock at night, that the day after the paying time expires the treasurer has a great deal to attend to; his books as a general thing have not been checked up during the rush, and for this reason we close the door so that we cannot be disturbed, and can get our books in shape to turn over to the auditor. While we have no right to take tax, persons having other business than that of paying of their tax have always been waited on at all times. One thing more, a great many persons have an idea that the treasurer gets the ten per cent. added by the auditor, this is not the case as the penalty always follows the principal.

Respectfully yours,
Daniel Gonser.

Crushed to Death.

A sad accident occurred at Butler on Tuesday morning. It seems that an elderly gentleman and lady got on the east bound Wabash train at Auburn Junction; after arriving at Butler they were in the act of crossing the Lake Shore track, when an unobserved approaching engine caught the lady, and before she could be rescued her body was severed, causing instant death. We were unable to learn the names of the parties, their residence or their destination.

Later.—The name of the unfortunate lady, as we have since learned, was America A. Sewell, wife of Joseph Sewell of Franklin township. Mr. Sewell, himself, as also the conductor of the Wabash train, came near sharing her fate, as the engine struck them both. So far as we can judge from the facts we have obtained, and from a perusal of the coroner's certificate, the blame attaches principally to Ira E. Merritt, engineer of No. 103 on the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad, who had no light displayed on the tender and had failed to give the proper signals. It is a horrible affair, indeed, and is only one of the many that occur daily.

Rest At Last.

Died.—Last Saturday morning, at half past seven, in Boonville, Mo., of consumption, Cyrus Milton Roth, aged 28 years, 5 months and 20 days.

Many of our citizens are familiar with the circumstances in connection with the long suffering of Milton Roth, who, until a few months since, had resided in this place for a number of years, and who, by his genial spirit and pleasant manners, had won scores of friends in this community. He went west several months since, in hopes of recovering his health, settling temporarily at a point in the Indian Reservation; but the fatal disease had already undermined his constitution, and frail nature was forced to yield. About five weeks ago his father, Isaac Roth, well known to all our people, started out there for the purpose of bringing him home, and they had proceeded only a short distance on the homeward journey when Death overtook them at a farm-house near Boonville, Mo., and the son breathed his last. The father had done all in his power to avert the fatal stroke, having watched over him and tended him constantly from the first, but to no avail; and his only alternative then was to return home in sadness with the corpse, where they arrived on Monday. The funeral took place Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, from the Presbyterian church, Rev. H. Johnson conducting the services.

AUTUMN.

BY S. A. LONG.

Once again the chilled hand of autumn
Sweeps from earth her beauteous robe of green,
Spreading o'er her face a sickly pallor,
Lending to our eyes a solemn scene.

Solemn, not because the leaves are falling;
Not because the fields are green no more;
Not because old earth's bright coat is fading;
Not because the summer time is o'er;

For within old nature's secret chambers
Embryonic blossoms ever bloom,
And the autumn's shade and freezing winter
Hold to them no semblance of a tomb;

But because in life we have an autumn,
Season of the summer's fading time—
Season that makes gray of golden ringlets—
Period of the ivy's frosted chime.

Yes, 'tis solemn, for the vivid pictures
Of our youth and childhood's happy days
Rise upon our fainting, fading eyesight—
Holy streakings of life's morning rays.

Solemn, for we see on earth no longer
Faces of the loved ones, gone before;
Falling on our ear the sad, sad warning
That our lives on earth will soon be o'er;

That the winter's breath is softly stealing,
And the locks of gold are growing gray;
That the severing car of dissolution
Soon will waft us from this house of clay.

But, when death's dark, frigid night is over,
Will there be another springtime then?
Will the flowers that faded in the autumn
Be revived and quickened once again?

Will those cherished souls that lost their luster
When the faded leaves began to fall
Spring, refreshed, anew within God's garden,
In the springtime, at the Master's call?

Will those hearts that loved and that were loving,
Beat within the realm of Paradise?
Will those eyes that beamed with radiant luster
Beam where soul's existence never dies?

Will those hands that were always doing
Deeds of kindness to the weary ones of earth
Still keep doing in that spring eternal,
When the eyes behold that nobler birth?

APPLETON, Ohio.

A SLIGHT MISTAKE.

To say that Harvey Foster was in a bad temper was to put the mildest form of words to express the savage mood in which he found himself one winter's evening, as he shot through the main street of the town of L., on his way homeward. Everything had gone exactly contrary to his wishes all the week.

Entirely ignorant of the fact that Harvey Foster was a man of standing and wealth in L., pretty Josie Ormstead allowed the minor fact, that he was insultingly free in his addresses, to influence her so strongly that her dignified reserve taught him the lesson he needed; and when he sought her for his wife she refused the honor.

To add to his discomfiture, the heiress, Miss Maud Chester—whom he had held in reserve, that his ambition might win a wife if his love would not—had coolly informed him that she was engaged to Fred Holt.

Now, if there was one man above another who was utterly detestable in the eyes of Harvey Foster, it was Fred Holt. They had been rivals at school, where both stood well in talent, application and social position; and Fred was ever a little in advance in every study, carrying away the contested prizes far more frequently than it suited Harvey he should. In society, Fred's handsome face, ready wit, courteous manners and frank, sunny temper kept him always in higher favor than Harvey Foster's sullen, cold disposition could gain.

And now, when Maud had been ever gracious to the son of the wealthy banker, Silas Foster, she answered his love suit by the tidings that his lifelong rival had won her promise to be his bride.

"And the worst of it, it will be just the match to suit his uncle," muttered Harvey, savagely. "No fear of him disinheriting Fred now."

For Harvey knew that Fred depended entirely upon the good-will of his mother's brother, James Rutherford, a wealthy and eccentric bachelor, for his income. He had been left an orphan when a mere boy, and his uncle had adopted and educated him, and would probably make him heir. But the bachelor, having long ago put away sentiment, if he ever felt it, looked to Fred to make a match that would increase his fortune and social position. It was the wish of his heart to see Fred the husband of Maud Chester, and his wish was to be fulfilled.

Harvey Foster, at odds with love, would like to see his rival refused, disinherited, humbled as he felt himself humbled, since neither love nor money would accept him. He strode over the pavement in a savage mood, and started suddenly to see Josie Ormstead coming out of a shop a few steps in advance of him. In her hand were several small packages, and her face was pale and anxious. In a moment Harvey was at her side.

"Let me carry some of your parcels," he said, lifting his hat as he spoke.

"Thank you, I have only a few steps to go," answered Josie, hurrying forward nervously.

"You need not be afraid of me," Harvey said, noting her nervous manner. "I will not annoy you. Why will you not believe my respect is as great for you as my love?"

And, before he knew exactly where his words were leading him, the young man was renewing the offer he had made before.

At the door of a small lodging-house Josie stopped and faced him.

"You have spoken so before, Mr. Foster," she said, gently; "and, because I believe you are sincere, I will tell you what I have kept secret for six months; I am already married!"

"Josie! Be quick! Why do you stand there?" cried a voice in the narrow hallway, and a man stepped into the bar of light thrown across the open door by a street lamp.

"Fred Holt!" muttered Harvey, starting forward. "Married! and to Fred Holt!"

It almost consoled him in his own disappointment to think of the hold he had upon his rival. Engaged to Maud Chester, and married to Josie Ormstead! Fancy the proud face when she knew she had been deceived for a girl who worked. And sweeter still was it to Harvey Foster to think of the wrath of James Rutherford when the news reached him.

But in his triumph Harvey Foster had resolved to be very cautious, to have strong proof of his rival's marriage before venturing to accuse, to either his uncle or his betrothed. He had noticed the number of the house in the glare of the street lamp, "No. 28 Ralph street." This was the entry he made in his note-book, in case his memory proved treacherous. It seemed as if fortune favored his plans.

Only the next day, happening to go into a large fruit and flower shop, he saw Fred Holt selecting the contents of a large fancy basket of choicest fruits and rarest blossoms. Nodding carelessly to Harvey, he wrote the address upon a card, and attached it to the pretty basket.

"You will send this at once," he said, and then left the shop.

And Harvey, taking the place Fred had just vacated, read the card: "Mrs. F. Holman, No. 28 Ralph street."

What proof was needed now? It was not in the nature of Harvey Foster to work openly in any scheme. A blow in the dark suited him better. Feeling sure of his position now, he hurried homeward to write two anonymous letters, which would, he fondly hoped, disinherit and utterly confound his long-successful rival.

One of these venomous missives found Maud Chester in her pretty boudoir, trifling with some embroidery, and dreaming sweet dreams of her love, and Fred Holt's devotion. She was a handsome, dignified girl of 19, full of all womanly sweetness, unspoiled by her great wealth. She loved Fred Holt with the whole strength of her young heart, and she was sure that her love was returned.

The dainty work under the slender fingers progressed slowly, as Maud lay back in her deep arm-chair, looking into the glowing fire and building castles of future happiness. From this tender reverie she was aroused by a servant, who handed her a squarely-folded letter, awkwardly addressed, and fastened with a wafer.

Wondering who her unknown correspondent could be, she opened the paper. The same straggling hand met her eyes. Only these few lines were written:

> If you would have a proof of the falsehood of one you believe true, go at 8 o'clock this evening to the second floor of No. 28 Ralph street, and you will find Mr. Fred Holt and his wife.

"Anonymous!" the proud girl said, her lips curling and her eyes flashing. "It is a falsehood!"

She threw the note upon the coals as she spoke, and watched the flames curl and blacken the paper till it flashed out of sight up the chimney. Then, with all the color stricken from her face, she took up her embroidery.

Had Harvey watched her then, he would have thought that that poisoned arrow had missed its aim. But it was not so. The work was thrown aside, the piano rang out under her restless fingers, a novel was opened, a room was put in order; but, while the calm face betrayed no secret suffering, the girl was tortured all day by the words of the anonymous note:

"Fred Holt and his wife!"

Could it be? Had the frank brown eyes that had looked so lovingly into hers mirrored only a false heart? Was she, indeed, so far deceived?

Long before 8 o'clock Maud Chester had resolved to prove or falsify the words that seemed burned upon her brain. Surely, of all the world she had the best right to test the truth of such a monstrous charge against her betrothed lover.

And while she was striving to hide from any eyes the tortures she endured, James Rutherford was storming up and down his library, holding the second of Harvey Foster's communications in his hand. In the same awkward handwriting, the same facts were stated, the same hour and place to verify the writer's words.

But the peppery old bachelor made no secret of his wrath. To have listened to him, one would have supposed that making mince-meat of his disobedient nephew was the least he intended. He called him all the pet names suggested by a furious rage; he used up all the abusive adjectives in the dictionary to describe Mr. Fred Holt. He exhausted every threat he could devise; long before 8 o'clock he had wrought himself up to a rage that was frightful to witness.

It was with a chuckle of satisfaction that Harvey Foster, secretly hidden in a narrow court-way, watched a tall, stately figure leave a carriage at the head of Ralph street, and walk to the door of No. 28. In the quiet of the street he heard a clear voice ask the servant who opened the door:

"Does Mrs. Holman live here?"

"Yes, ma'am; second floor."

"Is her husband at home?"

"O, yes, ma'am; you'll find them both there."

Then Maud Chester entered the house, just as a short, panting man dashed up the steps, and, not pausing to make inquiry, also entered.

In the passage, Maud Chester, turning, as rapid steps followed her, faced James Rutherford.

"You here!" he said. "You have heard, too, then, of the trick this ungrateful hound has played upon both of us?"

"I have heard," she answered, in a cold voice, "that your nephew's wife lives in this house. I wish to ascertain if it is true."

"We will soon see! we will soon see! Second floor. Here we are. Now, then!" And the old gentleman's raps proved the excitement under which he was laboring.

A very pale, sweet woman opened the door, her eyes showing that she had been weeping very recently.

"Does Mrs. Holman live here?" the old gentleman asked.

"That is my name, sir."

"Can I see your husband?"

The soft eyes, full of deep trouble, were lifted inquiringly to his face.

"Is it on business, sir?"

"Very important business," was the rather dry response.

"Because the doctor said to-day he must not have any mental excitement. He is so very much worse to-day; I—I am afraid he is dying!" And sobs broke out again.

"Dying!"

Maud Chester reeled into the room and sank dizzily upon a chair.

James Rutherford, with a face white as death, exclaimed:

"Dying! An accident?"

"No, sir; it is a fever from overwork."

"Fever—overwork!"

"Josie—Josie!"

If ever Fred Holt spoke he spoke then from an inner room, and the little wife, seeming to forget her strange visitors, answered quickly:

"I'm coming, Fred."

She went at once to the room from which the voice came, and again the two, listening intently, heard Fred's husky voice.

"Bring the last cordial, Josie. Ten drops! I am sure he knew me; but he is faint."

A moment later the same cheery voice spoke again:

"Drink this, old fellow. See! see! here is Josie! Don't you know Josie?"

Then another voice—Oh! so very faint!—said:

"Josie—little wife!"

A moment of utter silence followed, and then Josie said:

"There is a gentleman and lady in the other room, Fred, who want to see Frank. Will you see them?"

And Fred, appearing in compliance with this request, found his uncle vigorously fanning Maud Chester with a newspaper to bring her out of a fainting fit. Before he could frame a question, his uncle said, quickly:

"Get me some water!"

He obeyed. Then, when Maud's blue eyes opened with a bewildered stare, the old gentleman continued:

"We were sent here to see your domestic felicity, and we seem to be misinformed."

"My domestic felicity!" cried Fred.

"Read that," said his uncle, handing the anonymous note. And Fred complied.

"Humph! yes," he said. "So you came to see Mrs. Fred Holt? Well, that lady has made me a happy man," and his eyes flashed merrily upon Maud. "But I will introduce you to my cousin's wife, Mrs. Frank Holt. Maud," he continued, with gentle gravity, "since you have come here, it will be an act of Christian charity to remain, for"—and his voice sank very low—"we are afraid the poor little woman will be a widow before the morning."

"Poor fellow!" said James Rutherford. "What is the trouble?"

"Overwork. He thought he could increase his small salary by toiling over fine engraving in the evening, and he broke down. I never knew of his marriage till last week, when he wrote me a painful note, begging me to care for his wife, if he died. I came here at once, and was fortunate enough to win poor little Josie's sisterly confidence and affection. Maud, if the great trouble we fear comes——"

"I will be her true sister, Fred!" interrupted Maud.

Here was a deep silence of several minutes. Then Josie, very pale still, crept softly into the room.

"He is asleep!" she whispered. "The doctor said if he slept he would live!"

And when she broke into hysterical weeping, Maud held her close in loving arms, whispering that she must let her stay and comfort her, for Fred's sake.

Nearly 11 o'clock came, and still Harvey Foster waited, half-frozen, in the dark court-way, to see the discomfiture of his rival. Then his patience was rewarded by seeing Fred and his uncle come out of No. 28, arm-in-arm, evidently the best of friends, and enter Miss Chester's carriage and drive away.

Not until the day of the wedding, when he saw Josie an honored guest, and was introduced to Mr. Frank Holt, did Harvey Foster understand the slight mistake he had made.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

ILLINOIS is considered a tolerably well-settled State, but, with 20,000,000 acres under cultivation, Illinois has 8,000,000 uncultivated, an area as large as Massachusetts and Connecticut put together.

BOTH in Norway and Sweden the women preponderate in number over the men. At the last census of Norway, in 1875, the total population was 1,817,000, of which 886,000 were males and 931,000 were females, being at the rate of 488 males and 512 females to every 1,000 of the population. In Sweden the proportion of births is at the rate of 511 boys to 488 girls out of the 1,000; but the mortality is in favor of the females, for the census returns of 1876 showed 486 men to 514 women out of every 1,000 of the population.

THE elevation above the level of the sea of some of the chief railways of the world is as follows: The Apennine line, at its highest point, is 617 meters above the sea level; the Black Forest line, 850 meters; the Semmering, 890; and the railway over the Caucasus, 975 meters. The tunnel of the St. Gothard line attains an elevation of 1,154 meters; the Bremner line, 1,367, and the Mount Cenis line, 1,338. In America the highest lines are the North Pacific, which at its most-elevated point is 1,652 meters above the level of the ocean; the Central Pacific, 2,140; and the Union Pacific, 2,513 meters. The highest point of the railway over the Andes is 4,769 meters above the sea level.

OF the 185,000 miles of railroad completed in the world in 1878, nearly one-half were in the United States. In France, in 1878, there were 15,000 miles of railroad completed. The gross receipts were $162,847,105. The average receipts per mile were $13,132. They employed 183,000 men. The mean velocity of passenger trains was 32 miles per hour. In Great Britain, in 1877, there were open 17,000 miles of road, costing $174,000 per mile. The net earnings for eighteen years have exceeded 4 26-100 per centum per annum upon the amount invested. The average rate of speed for passenger trains was 40 miles per hour, with a maximum of 70 miles per hour on the best trains.

THE two persons who pay the largest taxes in Providence, R. I., are women—Mrs. Elizabeth Gambell, on property assessed at $997,200, and Caroline Goddard, on property worth $784,400.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

An Interesting Visit to the Great Expounder.

Mr. H. W. Raymond contributes to the November Scribner the first of several papers of extracts from note-books kept by his father, Henry J. Raymond, the journalist. We quote the following paragraphs, showing Webster in some of his most characteristic moods:

"January, 1848.—During this month, I made my first visit to Washington. While there, Mr. Webster made an argument before the Supreme Court in a case involving the merits of the rebellion in Rhode Island, in 1842. I reported that argument, and on the 30th (Friday) I called at Mr. Webster's house to read to him the report of it which I had prepared. The more I see him, the more profoundly does he impress me with his greatness—a greatness which is intrinsic and truly majestic, which derives no addition from external circumstances, and which is quite as impressive to the valet as to one who sees the subject of it only on holiday occasions.

"Mr. Webster expressed great satisfaction at my report, and seemed especially anxious to have the argument clearly set forth. As I read over to him the successive points, to every one which seemed peculiarly clear he would exclaim, 'Good,' 'That's true,' 'That's it,' etc., etc., apparently forgetting that the argument was his own, and applauding the performance of some other person. After the report was finished, I expressed my great admiration of its iron logic, and remarked that I thought it very timely, and well calculated to correct notions which are doing great mischief at the present time. He said he trusted it would be of service in that respect, and regretted the small attention which public men, legislators, etc., usually devote to discussion of those fundamental principles of government. I ventured to express a hope that he would give the world a philosophical history of Washington's administration, upon which I had been told he had been engaged, because I thought it would be desirable for his own fame, and would, moreover, set up a landmark for future ages.

"Mr. Webster said he had contemplated such a work; he had marked out its plan; resolved to make three volumes of it; divided it into chapters; written a portion of it, and made a very copious collection of materials for the whole work. He stated quite in detail the outline of his plan—saying that he desired neither to make it a mere narration like Hume, nor a mere biography like Rapin, but to combine the two and make the whole as vivid and graphic as possible. The persons whom Washington grouped around him in council seemed to command his special admiration, and he expressed a great desire to paint the scenes presented by their councils with more warmth than belonged (in his opinion) to his temperament.

"At a very early period of his life, he said, he began to think the exposition of the constitution his special field, his 'mission,' and the little that he knew, he added, was in that direction. He had of necessity studied the life and character of Washington very closely, and it was a character which would bear studying. We often hear, especially at the present time, of men who, though not wise themselves, have the tact to choose wise counselors. Many speak so of Washington. But the distinction was not just. All history, he said, shows that no weak Prince will choose wise counselors; he does not want to be surrounded by men superior to himself; he would feel himself dwarfed by their presence. Mr. Tyler had been unjustly dealt with in this respect. For a time he was very willing to trust public affairs with his Secretary, scarcely interfering with them at all. The whole Ashburton negotiation—'the little affair with Lord Ashburton,' as Mr. Webster styled it—he confided entirely to Mr. Webster; and so with the Rhode Island troubles. Mr. Webster was surprised at this, but he said Mr. Tyler promised to be a much better President than the public expected. Until Mr. Clay's 'acrimonious violence' drove him into the ranks of the opposition, Mr. Tyler conducted affairs with dignity and ability. But he had not been in office a month when Mr. Clay insisted upon an answer to the question whether Mr. Tyler intended to run for a second term. And he pressed it so pertinaciously and with so much violence that Mr. Tyler said one day, jocularly, 'Mr. Clay, I have been so much annoyed by this that I believe I shall send for Mr. Southard—President of the Senate—and resign at once.' This convinced Mr. Clay that Mr. Tyler would stand again, and from that time he denounced him and drove him into the opposition, thus blasting all the fruits of the Whig victory of 1840. He would have had the same difficulty with Gen. Harrison, had he lived.

"I spoke of Mr. Clay's pressing for a renomination now, and expressed surprise. Mr. Webster said J. Q. Adams some years ago remarked that 'Mr. Clay would be a candidate so long as he should receive a nomination from a majority of the people in the town of Lexington'—and he believed it would prove true. The mere pleasure of being talked of as a candidate, he said, was a positive gratification which became necessary to many men, and grew stronger with their age. After all, said he, what will Mr. Clay leave for future ages? His speeches contain nothing of permanent value—all relating to temporary topics, and never discussing fundamental principles. He is not an instructed statesman—he knows nothing of the matters in that paper we have talked about; and for what, said he, will he be remembered? For his brilliant, effective, popular eloquence, I suggested. Yes, said he, but how much has that availed Patrick Henry? It is ephemeral, traditional, of little value to any one. Mr. Clay, he thought, had always kept the Whig party subservient to his personal ambition, and seemed still disposed to do so. Mr. Webster talked in this strain for some time, and with great freedom and earnestness.

"He asked if I had heard Atty. Gen. Clifford in reply to his Rhode Island argument. I told him only in part. He said that Mr. Clifford remarked that Mr. Webster's premises were undeniable, and he could not see any flaw in his logic; but there must be some fallacy in it, because it led to conclusions which he could not admit! This, Mr. Webster said, was like Jefferson, who told him once that in very early life he resolved to have nothing to say to John Marshall, for he would always get him to admit certain positions (which he could not question) and then he would lead him to conclusions which he would not believe, and which he could not avoid! This, he said, was characteristic of Jefferson, who has no reasoning faculty, but who knew exactly how to touch the popular feeling, and was entirely unscrupulous in exercising that skill.

"Mr. Webster talked very freely for an hour and said he intended to speak in the Senate on the war question, and desired that I should report it. He said he should not speak upon the question until the close of the debate. I said he seemed not to share the fears which other Senators had expressed, that if they could not speak soon the subject would be exhausted! You know, said Mr. Webster, we farmers have a fashion of going over a field for the gleanings after the harvest. Yes, said I, and some could find more there than others could at first. Mr. Webster said he did not wish to speak if the rumors of a treaty then current should prove to be well founded. He had no idea of having it thus upset. I asked him if he did not look forward with apprehension to the issue of the war, and the absorption of all Mexico. He said he did; that the future was entirely overcast, and it was very difficult to see any way of safety. But, he added, he was not disposed to sit down in perfect despair as Mr. Calhoun had done, and say that he could see no future for his country. Even if annexation of all Mexico should take place, and a dissolution of our Union should be the result, still, said he, we of the North are on the safe side. We have the wealth, the numbers, the commerce, the enterprise. All the best elements of national power are on our side; we are the strongest portion, and in the event of dissolution we must still constitute the great nation of the continent. We had, therefore, less to fear from this crisis than other portions of the country. I said that few public men were willing to look the matter thus boldly in the face. He said he never alluded to it publicly, but these were the views he took of it in his private reflections upon the subject.

"In course of the conversation concerning the notions prevalent in regard to popular liberty, I said that the time seemed distant when men in this country should be governed by cool reason and judgment instead of passion and prejudice. He said yes—that the prospect was discouraging, because events were constantly occurring to turn the tide, even when it seemed to be setting well. Under Mr. Adams things went on pretty well. Then came Jacksonism, which threw the whole country into the boiling caldron of passion and excitement. Then under Mr. Van Buren the tone of public feeling, especially the spirit that prevailed at Washington, greatly improved, and continued to do so until Mr. Clay, by his acrimonious course toward Mr. Tyler, again threw everything into confusion, and now we were in a condition certainly unpromising enough.

"My interview with Mr. Webster lasted an hour or more, and he talked very freely—with great dignity and deliberation, yet as socially and easily as if with an old friend. There was about him nothing of the hauteur usually ascribed to him; yet he never forgot, although he did not seem to remember, his character and fame."

Egyptian Tales.

The Egyptian genius delighted in the construction of stories. Some of the stories have come down through the Greeks, especially Herodotus, who gathered them during his travels, and mixed them up in a confusion which is charming, while it is perplexing, with his historical notes; others survive in forms more or less imperfect and mutilated in the papyruses. Some of them give a sorry idea of the morals and moral tastes of the people; but we may hope that in this respect they do them as great injustice as the stories of the French novelists do to the people whose life they shamelessly distort. Among those which have come down through the Greeks is the incident which is the probable foundation of the story of "Cinderella." It is related by Strabo, of Rhodopis, the "rosy-cheeked," who became Queen Nitocris, and had her name associated with one of the great pyramids. The wind carried away her sandal while she was bathing, and laid it at the feet of the King, who was sitting in the open air. His attention was attracted by its delicate and symmetrical shape, and he sought her out and made her his Queen. The most perfectly preserved of the stories in papyrus is called "The Tale of the Two Brothers," and is full of incidents of a peculiar character. A tale called the "Doomed Prince" has attracted considerable attention, but it is abruptly broken off by the mutilation of the only copy, and leaves no clew to the ending. Many other stories are in the same situation, but what remains shows great richness of fancy.—National Repository.

Blondin Risking His Neck.

In the old Exhibition Building in Vienna, Blondin daily risks his life on a rope stretched across the vast dome at a giddy height. Blondin has expressly requested that no net be placed under the rope to break his fall should an accident occur. He says that he has found by experience that the public do not care half so much for his performance when the possibility of a terrible accident is not present to lend a zest to the show. He receives a large sum of money for every exhibition, and the more daring his feats the higher are his wages. He now traverses the rope without the balancing bar, walking backward blindfolded. Blondin is followed everywhere by a Mr. Thompson, who has made a bet of £10,000 that the hero of Niagara will fall from the rope and be killed ere he attains the age of 60. Five years more and the cruel wager will be decided one way or the other, for Blondin is already 55.

THE CONSCIENCE AND FUTURE JUDGMENT.

I sat alone with my conscience
In a place where time had ceased,
And we talked of my former living
In the land where the years increased;
And I felt I should have to answer
The question it put to me,
And to face the answer and question
Throughout an eternity.
The ghosts of forgotten actions
Came floating before my sight
And things I thought were dead things
Were alive with a terrible might;
And the vision of all my past life
Was an awful thing to face—
Alone with my conscience sitting
In that solemnly silent place.
And I thought of a far-away warning,
Of a sorrow that was to be mine,
In a land that then was the future,
And now is the present time,
And I thought of my former thinking
Of the judgment-day to be,
But sitting alone with my conscience
Seemed judgment enough for me.
And I wondered if there was a future
To this land beyond the grave;
But none gave me an answer,
And no one came to save.
And I felt that the future was present,
And the present would never go by.
For it was but the thought of my past life
Grown into eternity.
Then I woke from my timely dreaming,
And the vision passed away,
And I knew the far-away warning
Was a warning of yesterday.
And I pray that I may not forget it,
In this land before the grave,
That I may not cry in the future,
And no one come to save.
And so I have learnt a lesson
Which I ought to have known before,
And which, though I learnt it dreaming,
I hope to forget no more.
So I sit alone with my conscience,
In the place where the years increase,
And I try to remember the future,
In the land where time will cease;
And I know of the future judgment,
How dreadful soe'er it be,
That to sit alone with my conscience
Will be judgment enough for me.

"CAN you cure my eyes?" said a man to Dr. Brown. "Yes," said the doctor, "if you will follow my prescription." "Oh, certainly, doctor," said the patient; "I will do anything to have my eyes cured. What is your remedy, doctor?" "You must steal a horse," said the doctor, very soberly. "Steal a horse, doctor!" said the patient, in amazement. "How will that cure my eyes?" "You will be sent to State prison for five years, where you could not get whisky; and, during your incarceration, your eyes would get well," said the doctor. The patient looked somewhat incredulous, but he did not adopt the doctor's remedy.

"YOU play poker, of course," said one gentleman to another, who was shuffling a pack of cards in such a scientific manner as to betray an intimate acquaintance with the articles. "No, I never do," was the response. "Indeed," exclaimed the questioner, "I thought everybody in Eureka played poker." "I am the solitary exception." "And how is that?" "Well, you see, I got into a big game; had an ace full and lost $300; then I held four queens and got beat out of $600 more. A Lighted Weed.

A countryman on a ferry-boat the other night put a cigar into his mouth, and a gentleman who was sitting next to him handed him a lighted weed. The countryman took it and contemptuously threw it on the floor, whereupon the gentleman screamed:

"What did you do that for, sir?"

"'Cause I don't smoke butts," was the reply.

"But I gave it to you to take a light from," protested the gentleman.

"Well," said the Hoosier, "I ain't no Greek; I chaw my cigars."

And he chawed, and that ended the conversation.

The Morbid Desire to Die.

We will not pine for death and rest,
Too soon from service breaking;
All plucked unripe can ne'er be blest,
Our task beneath forsaking.
Not till the course is run
Our Leader says "Well done."
Not till the conflict's borne
The chaplet can be worn,
The cross, the crown is making.

Our life on earth has tender ties
We should not wish to sever;
Rich works of faith, sweet charities,
Which soon must cease forever.
To watch, and weep, and wait;
By love to conquer hate;
The flesh in curb to keep;
To rescue wandering sheep—
How noble such endeavor!

'Tis gain if Jesus bids us die,
When young, mature or hoary;
'Tis loss to wish the fight to fly,
Foreclosing life's bright story.
To battle for His laws;
To suffer for His cause;
To share His grief and shame;
To vindicate His name;
To live for Christ is glory.

Christians the Guardians of the Sabbath.

Much has been said and done to secure a better observance of the Sabbath. Has it occurred to you, Christians, that you are the guardians of this day? If you wish others to respect God's laws you must respect them. If you wish others to obey God's commands you must obey them; and you must be particular about that obedience. If you seek your pleasure by driving out with your family on the Lord's day your non-Christian neighbor, who has different tastes, will see no harm in seeking his with dog and gun. If you patronize Sunday trains, even for the purpose of seeking the church of your choice, the non-Christian community will see no harm in using the same Sunday trains to seek places of their choice. And I might continue. A strict observance of the Sabbath by the church is the only vote of the church for a decent observance of the day by the world.

The fourth commandment is the dyke which keeps back an ocean of corruption. Through a break in the dyke any sin can enter. Shall we, Christians, with hands washed clean in the blood of Him who plants the dyke, scoop out the sand and roll away the stones, while the merciless ocean laughs, and hisses, and leaps with playful treachery into the breach we have made!

Do I mistake? There is power enough in the church to save the Christian Sabbath in America. But if this power is not exerted, or is used in the wrong direction, whose is the pen that dares venture a description of the consequences? While I was musing on the ten commandments, I seemed to see a string of invaluable pearls. Their luster was glorious as you looked at them in the light of the "Sun of Righteousness." And they were ancient, too. I saw them committed to the church for safe-keeping. And He who committed them said: "In keeping of them there is great reward." And while I was watching I saw the shadowy hand of no uncertain personage stretched out over one of the brightest of them all. And a siren voice whispered in the ear of the church, "Let me have just this one." But the church answered promptly, "No." Meanwhile, the shadowy hand, remaining, artfully covered the brilliancy of the pearl. And after some time had passed the siren voice whispered again: "Let me have this one, for it has lost its luster and the day of its value has gone by." And the church looked at the shaded pearl, but answered not a word. Stealthily the dark fingers clutched the coveted prize and began to draw it away; and, as I beheld, the nine followed the one, for they were united and inseparable.—REV. G. T. RAYMOND.

Melted by a Child's Kiss.

Moore describes the effect upon the heart of a fierce robber of discovering a little child at prayer:

He hung his head; each nobler aim,
And hope, and feeling, which had slept
From boyhood's hour, that instant came
Fresh o'er him—and he wept—he wept.

Often and again has penitent and even hardened guilt surrendered and found the way to forgiveness by contact with infant innocence. A young man in one of the towns of Eastern Illinois—of fine appearance and fine capabilities—fell into bad company, and went from bad to worse till he broke the laws of the State, and was arrested, tried, and sentenced to the penitentiary.

His crime (committed hastily, in evil association, and the heat of liquor) was a grave one, and the term of his penal disgrace lasted several years. He came out friendless, and the prison brand upon him, but with a desire to lead a reformed life.

He sought employment, and his prepossessing appearance was still in his favor, but business men turned him away, with one excuse or another, when he honestly told them who he was. One of them, however, took an interest in him, and, though he would not himself employ him, thought that he might try and help him to a situation somewhere else.

He brought him to the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association in Chicago, and introduced him as a discharged State prison convert, "discouraged because he could find nothing to do." Discouraged, in truth, the poor fellow was, and this tardy kindness was probably but just in time to save him from desperation.

He was welcomed to the rooms, and conversation with him convinced his new friends of his real desire to do well. One of the managers, to his surprise, invited him home to dine with him. Entering the house, the gentleman was met by his little daughter, 8 years old, with the wonted embrace and kiss.

"Emma," said he, introducing his companion, "this is papa's friend." And at once the trusting child threw her arms around the stranger's neck, and kissed him as she had kissed her father. Softened already by an act of friendly confidence, the poor ex-convict quite broke down now.

Turning to his benefactor, his face streaming with tears, he said, "It's the first kiss I've received since my mother died. It breaks my heart!"

Blest tears of soul-felt penitence!
In whose benign, redeeming flow
Is felt the first, the only sense
Of guiltless joy that guilt can know.

It would not be hard to guess the sequel if the story ended here. It is enough to know that the help of the Association secured a good place for the rescued criminal, and kept the arms of its love around him till he entirely "put off the old man and put on the new." Since then, his life has been given to the service of his new Master, and has been a joy to those who showed him kindness when he was forsaken.

"Is Life Worth Living?"

Mr. Curtis once asked Mr. Greeley, in response to a similar question put to him by the great editor: "How do you know, Mr. Greeley, when you have succeeded in a public address?" Mr. Greeley, not averse to the perpetration of a joke at his own expense, replied: "When more stay in than go out." Mr. Mallock's famous question, answered by himself in a weak way, and repeated by Prof. Mivart, and answered in a stronger way, is practically voted on every day, by the entire human race, and decided in the affirmative. "More stay in than go out," for reasons very much less important than those considered by Mr. Mallock and Prof. Mivart. There are great multitudes of men who possess neither the Roman Catholic faith nor rightness of life nor love, who yet live out their lives in the firm conviction that it pays them to live—men who are open to no high considerations, such as would have weight with the Mallocks and Mivarts.

There is a great pleasure in conscious being. So universal is this that, when a man occasionally takes his life, it is considered by those whom he leaves behind him as presumptive proof that he is insane. We say of a man who designedly ends his life that he is not in his right mind. One of the most pathetic things about death is the bidding good-by to a body that has been the nursery and home of the spirit which it has charmed through the ministry of so many senses.

For who, to dumb forgetfulness a prey,
This pleasing, anxious being e'er resigned,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing, lingering look behind?

Men find their pay for living in various ways. Hope may lie to them, but they always believe her, nevertheless. The better things to come, of which she tells all men, become, indeed, the substance of the things desired; that is, expectation is a constant joy and inspiration. The pay for this day's trouble and toil is in the reward which is expected to-morrow. That reward may never come, but the hope remains; and so long as that lives it pays to live. It pays some men to live that they may make money and command the power that money brings. To what enormous toils and sacrifices the love and pursuit of money urge a great multitude of men! The judgment of these men as to whether life is worth living is not to be taken at life's close, when they sum up their possessions and what they have cost, but while they are living and acting. A man whose life is exhausted may well conclude that what he has won is vanity; but it was not vanity to him while he was winning it; and, in the full possession of his powers, he believed that life was worth living. * *

Life is quite worth living to all those who find engaging objects of pursuit, and especially to those who win success in their pursuits. We repeat, therefore, that, by almost a unanimous vote, the human race practically decides every day that life is worth living. Mr. Mallock thinks it is worth living provided a man has faith in a great church; and Prof. Mivart—a Catholic himself—thinks life's highest values are in the doing of duty and in love. We should be the last to claim that happiness is the highest aim of life, and that, unless that is secured, life is a failure, and not worth living. To do right, to sacrifice one's self for love—these are better things than pleasure. To love and to be loved—these are things that pay. To be conscious of nobility of character and unselfishness of life; to be conscious that our lives are brought into affectionate relations with other and harmonious life—what are these but life's highest values? What are these but the highest satisfactions of conscious being?

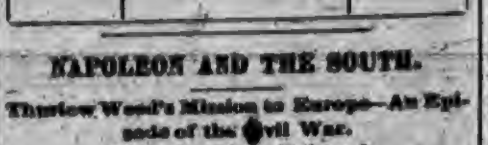
If this be true—that character, and duty, and love are better than pleasure and better than any success without them—then there is no human being who needs to say that life is not worth living. But the people who do not succeed, who are unloved, who live lives of pain, and want, and weakness—what is there for these? A chance for conscious nobility of character and life; and, if this be not enough, as it rarely is, a faith, not in a great church, but in a good God, and an immortality that will right the wrongs and heal the evils of the present life, and round into completeness and symmetry its imperfections and deformities. Is it not foolish, after all, to raise the question of success or failure in treating a life that is only germinal or fractional?—J. G. Holland, in Scribner.

What Americans Buy in Europe.

I recently accompanied an American on a shopping tour, his object being to purchase some presents to take with him back to his native land. After securing several parcels, consisting of trinkets and newly-invented articles, the shopkeeper handed him a small pin, saying, "This celluloid jewelry sells well, as do most things that come from America." "But," returns the gentleman, "I am from America myself, and I do not think it will pay to purchase articles to carry back to America which are made there." "Why, sir," exclaimed the tender, "six of the eight articles which you have purchased were made in America, and I can sell you twenty-six more from the same country with pleasure, if you choose to buy." The gentleman left the establishment under the impression that our export trade is in a flourishing condition. So is every one else impressed who has noticed the shop windows and market places of Europe within the past year.—Foreign letter.

An Old Puzzle Revived.

It is said that a gentleman in Paris has offered a prize of 20,000 francs to anyone who will draw the annexed figure with a pencil or pen without lifting either from the paper or interfering with any line or portion of a line, previously made. "The thing can be done," and the door has only to go to France, prove his ability to conquer the puzzle, and take the reward:



NAPOLEON AND THE SOUTH.

Thurlow Weed's Mission to Europe—An Episode of the Civil War.

[From the Chicago Tribune.]

The interview between the Hon. Thurlow Weed and a representative of the New York Herald touching the relations of France to the North during the civil war, which was printed in our last issue, not only adds some new and very valuable information to our war history, but is peculiarly interesting as showing how narrow an escape we had from a war with France at an extremely critical period. Of the four Commissioners sent to Europe by President Lincoln—Archbishop Hughes, Bishop McIlvaine, Gen. Scott and Mr. Weed—all were confident that Napoleon was friendly. The same delusion was shared by Mr. Dayton, the Minister at Paris, and Mr. Bigelow, the Consul General; and, had it not been for what may be called an accident that brought the news of Napoleon's hostility to the ears of Mr. Dayton, our representatives might have gone on laboring under the delusion that France would not interfere until she had declared war against us. Every subsequent event was fortunate. Mr. Dayton, as soon as the rumor came to him, sent to London post-haste for Mr. Weed, who left immediately. As soon as he arrived he was informed of the unpleasant news. Mr. Weed happened to remember that he had a letter of introduction to one M. Lubat. He delivered it at once, and his apprehensions were confirmed, as M. Lubat informed him that the danger of war was imminent. He advised him to have an audience with the Emperor at once, to which Mr. Weed replied that Mr. Dayton would arrange one, but probably could not effect it until after the meeting of the Chambers. This would be too late, as the mischief by that time would have been done. M. Lubat volunteered to arrange the interview, and on the very next day succeeded in procuring an audience for Mr. Weed with the Count De Morny. The result of that interview is thus stated by Mr. Weed:

> Upon my expressing the solicitude felt by our Minister, Mr. Dayton, in relation to the forthcoming speech of the Emperor, De Morny, with considerable emphasis, said that France was suffering so seriously from our civil war that the Emperor would be compelled to refer to the subject in his address. I inquired if all wars of commercial nations did not, necessarily, more or less inconvenience neighboring nations. He replied that our war was an exceptional one; that other nations were dependent upon us for cotton; that our blockade and the destruction of the Charleston harbor had deprived Europe of an article essential to its interests; that France was a paternal Government, and when it could not furnish its people with labor was compelled to supply them with bread. When I urged that the blockade, as a war measure, found precedents in European wars, the Count replied that there was no such justification or excuse for destroying the harbor of Charleston, one of the most important, if not the most important, cotton harbor in our country. I replied that the Count was laboring under a misapprehension in regard to Charleston harbor; that, instead of being demolished, it had simply been obstructed, and that the rocks placed there could be readily removed when there was no further occasion for such obstruction.

Every objection that was offered by the Count was removed by Mr. Weed, and every alleged violation of international practices was justified by precedents in the French and English wars. At the close of the interview the Count said that he should meet the Emperor on the evening when the speech to the Chambers would be read first to the Cabinet, and would present his points. The next day the Emperor made his speech, and it was amicable. The danger had blown over. Had Mr. Weed been a day later, or had he failed to procure the interview, we might have had a war with France on our hands, and at the very time when England was most hostile to us, and was inflamed with indignation at the arrest of Mason and Slidell. The escape seems almost providential in every one of its details, and in none less than in the fact that this delicate duty was intrusted to such an intelligent and skillful representative as Mr. Weed. He is more than ever entitled to the gratitude of the country for his eminent services, and that gratitude will not be any the less hearty because pertinent circumstances have called out the story he has so long kept to himself.

Mixed Relationship.

A telegram was received in Colorado a few days since directing the proper authorities to arrest a young man who, it was alleged, had run away with his aunt. "I have an order for your arrest," remarked the officer, addressing the supposed criminal. "For what?" "You have been running away with your aunt." "My aunt? Why, she's my wife!" "But wasn't she your aunt before she became your wife? You see, we don't tolerate these kinds of goings on out in Colorado." "I suppose you were never in Utah?" remarked the young man, after he had completed his survey of the detective. "No." "Well, as you don't understand the relations of an aunt and nephew in that Territory, I suppose I ought to explain them to you, and then, perhaps, you may see your duty plainer. My father married my mother." "I suppose so." "Then he married her sister," continued the stranger, without heeding the interruption. "Then he married the sister of his brother-in-law; then the daughter of his uncle, who was a cousin to his first two wives; then he married her daughter; and a son of this wife married my sister, who was also a widow of one of the other wives' sons. I suppose you are following me?" interjected the narrator. "Marry your aunt or your grandmother either, or both of them." "And you won't arrest me?" "No; you might be your own father."

A TOURIST new to the beer-drinking ways of the good people of Munich asked a lady presiding at a "bier halle" if her customers did not frequently become intoxicated. "Santa Maria! sir, they never get drunk, but they sometimes burst!"

GOV. HENDRICKS.

Synopsis of His Indianapolis Speech.

Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks recently delivered a speech of an hour and a quarter in length, at Washington Hall, Indianapolis. After a few preliminary remarks, he referred to the Republican victories of this year. Regarding Maine, he said that Grant carried it by 30,000, but this year the Republicans were less than the Democrats and Nationals. In California the party lines were broken down by the Chinese question, and Ohio, which was a Republican State, had simply gone Republican. The Republicans were elated over the latter, because without carrying it they could not look for any national success whatever. "Will you Democrats," he said, "who never faltered or never feared for the future be discouraged? Seven years ago I was the only Governor elected in any Northern State. This State went Republican in 1864 by 27,000 majority. We have reduced the majority again and again, until now, with whatever hesitation I may speak of other States, I understand the State of Indiana and have no fears." Gov. Hendricks charged that the Republicans had an organization called the Emigration Society in Washington city, which had for one of its purposes the importing of colored voters into this city, and dwelt upon the cheapening of the labor of the State by this process. In regard to State sovereignty, he said:

> We Democrats stand by the Union with all the powers that the constitution delegates; by the States with all the rights that the constitution reserves to them. You all know that during the progress of the war at every political meeting you heard the appeal made to the citizens to volunteer to preserve the best Government in the world—that Government which received the sanction and blessing of the great men that established it, Madison and Monroe; and such mighty men as Jackson; and in the war, wherever a national gun was fired, its meaning was that the Government was to be preserved, with all the rights of the States delegated to them by the constitution.

Referring to the Grant boom, Gov. Hendricks said:

> I don't want a man on horseback to represent the institutions of our country. They want to reverse the idea that our institutions rest upon the consent of the people, and establish in its stead the idea of physical force. If there is a dispute among us, how shall we decide it? Shall we invoke the sword and bayonet to decide, or shall we, according to the civil idea, bring our controversy into court and have it settled there? Is it not strange that this Republican party, that claims it is so sure of victory in the future, has now appealed to this idea for success? They tell us they are going to nominate Grant. Of that I have no doubt. To succeed they have to tread under foot the traditions of all generations since Washington left the Presidential chair. The Republicans are very mad about the Brigadiers in Congress. They are not mad because Hayes has a Brigadier in his Cabinet, or that there are five Brigadiers in the United States courts, administering the laws of the country. The Brigadiers in Congress have abolished the test oath, restored the silver dollar to its place in the currency of the country, have stopped the enormous payments to fraudulent loyalty and of fraudulent claims and reduced the expenditures $30,000,000 a year, and have made the issue that elections must not be controlled by troops. What have the Brigadiers done that any man can find fault with?

In referring to Hayes' veto of the Supervisors bill Gov. Hendricks said that a man who got into office the way Hayes did ought to wear his official robes modestly, and ought not to veto a bill involving no constitutional question. One Congress ought certainly to have the right to repeal a law passed by another. In conclusion Gov. Hendricks said:

> After all, the only place where the American citizen expresses his acts, his opinions, and his power is at the ballot-box, and that little ballot that he drops in there is the written sentiment of the times; and is the power that he has as a citizen of this great republic. It must not be interfered with. It must be preserved. I think you will preserve it. It is not always that Hayes will be vetoing things—at least we have got a subject for effort. We have got something to work for. We have got the freedom of the ballot, the freedom of legislation, and the maintenance of the institutions of our country as our fathers framed them, and as modified by the amendments to the constitution, to assert, defend and preserve; and I am proud to know that, in 1876, the great army that rallied around that banner representative of American liberty was more than 4,000,000 strong. The greatest army that was ever organized on earth was the army of American freemen that voted for Tilden and Hendricks. It was 200,000 majority over all, white and black, votes of this country. It was more than a million of a majority, and more majority than was ever given in the history of the United States, that was ever given for the candidates for President and Vice President of the United States. You, my fellow-citizens, that know my sentiments almost as though you could read with a glass—you men know that I did not want to become a candidate for the Vice Presidency of the United States, but when the word came over the wires that there were 4,000,000 men voted for me for the second office in the Government, for that compliment—for no man could be more highly honored—I felt honored; but if I had not received the votes of the people, and could have slipped in some other way, as the scriptures explain it, not going in at the straight gate, but had climbed up over the wall, and round about—in that way had I sneaked into the office—then indeed would I expect no man to honor me, for I could not honor myself. That is the condition of the two gentlemen that got in there. There may be demonstrations upon the streets, and there may be shouts and hurrahs as they pass by, but history will write this story, and what she writes will never, never be obliterated. It goes to history, and down along all generations of men that one President and one Vice President came in without election, and it is the last time that story is to be written in the history of America.

The Pernicious Agitators.

A Washington dispatch to the New York Tribune reports the assertion of a Federal official in Texas that "the Democratic party in that State is rapidly breaking up." And the Boston Herald (Rep.) receives impressions from Southern journals that "in the next State elections there will be a division in the Democratic party, and such a division as will be likely to improve greatly upon the solid front hitherto presented, and which has been productive of so much mischief." We have no doubt there is truth at the bottom of both these statements.

To prevent that result, and to keep the South solid, is the present work of Foster, Blaine, Zach Chandler and other Republican managers at the North. They wave the bloody shirt, make dire threats against the South, and strive in every way possible to keep open old sectional sores and intensify sectional prejudices. They know that that course is eminently calculated to knit the South together as a unit.

The South is solid because self-protection to life and property enjoins it. The Republican leaders will have it so, and work to keep it so. They could, long since, have divided the South into two great parties, or more than two parties, for that matter, had they pursued the proper course to win adherents, and divide the Democracy in that section.

In the first place, by their reconstruction policy, which is acknowledged by themselves to be a failure as to the expected uses of the negroes as a political factor, they put upon the Southern whites the greatest humiliation it was possible to inflict on them—they made their former slaves their masters.

In the second place, for the sake of securing the Federal patronage to Northern Republicans at the North, they sacrificed the Republican party at the South, and thereby give up the South, negroes and all, to the Democracy.

And now, in order to secure power at the North, which is the far stronger section, they threaten, if successful, to put new chains on the South, and put them again under negro rule by means of the standing army. Who need wonder at the South being a political unit?

These political agitators are the enemies of the peace and prosperity of the country, and patriotic citizens should vote them down at the polls. They have their counterparts at the South, and between them the country is kept in turmoil and hot water. It is time the two classes were frowned into obscurity by all good citizens, North and South.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

The Next Electoral College.

There are a few doubting Thomases among the Democrats of this vicinity who seem to regard the loss of Ohio by the Democracy, on Tuesday, as fatal to the prospects of that party in the Presidential contest of next year. Such men have evidently paid but little attention to the aspect of affairs as presented by the latest elections held in the North and West. A careful survey of the field shows that the Democrats are not as liable to defeat as would appear at first glance, but stand more than an even chance of success. In the North the Democracy can safely lay claim to the States of Connecticut, Indiana, New Jersey, and New York. There may be some who will dispute the possibility of carrying New York. The present split in the Democratic ranks may lose the State for the Democrats at the election next month. But a year hence this dissension will be healed, and the Democracy will present a solid front. With a united Democracy the State is certain to cast its electoral vote for the candidate of the party, whoever he may be.

A look at the complexion of the next Electoral College presents the following as the probable and almost positive status of that body after the election of November, 1880:

DEMOCRATIC STATES.	Electoral Vote.	REPUBLICAN STATES.	Electoral Vote.
Alabama	10	California	6
Arkansas	6	Colorado	3
Connecticut	6	Illinois	21
Delaware	3	Iowa	11
Florida	4	Kansas	5
Georgia	11	Maine	7
Indiana	15	Massachusetts	13
Kentucky	12	Michigan	11
Louisiana	8	Minnesota	5
Maryland	8	Nebraska	3
Mississippi	8	Nevada	3
Missouri	15	New Hampshire	5
New Jersey	9	Ohio	22
New York	35	Pennsylvania	29
North Carolina	10	Rhode Island	4
South Carolina	7	Vermont	5
Tennessee	12	Total	153
Texas	8
Virginia	11
West Virginia	5
Total	203

DOUBTFUL STATES.
Oregon	3
Wisconsin	10
Total	13

In the above computation we give the Republicans the States of Illinois and California, which may fairly be considered doubtful, and, granting them both Oregon and Wisconsin, it will be seen that they can not, by any method of figuring, command more than 166 electoral votes, which is nineteen less than a majority. With a candidate for Vice President from Illinois—such a man as Gen. J. M. Palmer, for instance—that State could easily be carried by the Democrats, and in that event the party could afford the loss of New York. But, as we have said, the existing breach in the party in that State will, no doubt, be healed before the Presidential election, and with a united Democracy the Empire State will be Democratic to the core.

We can afford to allow the Republican party to take Ohio, and yet win the battle in 1880. There is margin enough to work upon, provided no grave blunders are committed. In fact, the result in Ohio settles all dissensions on the financial question, and cleaves the way for a rousing Democratic victory in 1880.—St. Paul (Minn.) Globe.

The "Esq." Brought the Money.

A young man, whose money did not hold out as long as the State Fair, dropped into the telegraph office and sent a dispatch to his father in the interior to forward him cash to reach home with. When the receiving clerk saw that the dispatch read "To John Blank, Esq.," he suggested that a saving could be effected by erasing the "Esq."

"Well, mebbe you think so, but I don't," replied the sender. "When I am at home I can call him 'dad' all day long, but when it comes down to black and white you've got to 'Esquire' him right up to the nines or walk home by the dirt road. Don't you dare leave that off—not with the roads as muddy as they are now!"

In about an hour the following answer was received:

To ——: John Blank, Esq., forwards you $10, and you can have more, if you want it.
JOHN BLANK, ESQ.

"Didn't I tell ye?" chuckled the young man as he read it. "Dad's common enough when we're all home and rushed to get fall wheat in, but the minute his back gets rested and a stranger comes along, he weighs more to the ton than any 'Esq.' on legs. I tell ye, you don't know a man till ye have hoed corn with him!"—Council Bluffs Union.

INDIANA ITEMS.

RECEIPTS of the State fair aggregate $23,000, and leave a profit of $8,000.

REPORTS come in from the Kankakee that some fine salmon are being taken.

TEN years ago, Oct 23, snow was ten inches deep on the streets of Lafayette.

THE Fort Wayne water works will cost $233,033, if completed at contract prices.

THE State House foundation will reach the top of the ground before winter.

THE Lower Ohio has not been as low, and navigation as difficult, in the past thirty years as at present.

THE City Council of Vincennes has resolved to purchase another steam fire engine, one not being deemed sufficient.

VERNON TINGLEY, son of of Dr. Tingley, of Greencastle, has gone as clerk to Col. J. R. Weaver, Consul General to Austria.

SAMUEL WELLAND, residing at New Paris, lost one of his imported Clydesdale stallions, valued at $2,500, by lung fever, a few days ago.

IT is probable the Indianapolis, Delphi and Chicago railroad, now building, will find an entrance into Indianapolis over the Bee line.

THE long warm spell has brought late corn out wonderfully, and it is now thought that the crop in Northern Indiana will be the largest known.

EVANSVILLE Courier: Traffic on the river is sadly impeded by the low stage of the water. The boats spend the greater portion of their time on the sand-bars.

FARMERS report that the fly is injuring their early-sown wheat. Some of the Shaker Prairie farmers are plowing under their earliest-sown wheat and resowing.

AN apple tree in Indianapolis bore fruit an inch in diameter, the second crop this year. Cherry trees bloomed also, but show no cherries. Several pear and other fruit trees bloomed quite profusely.

GREAT excitement prevails in Catholic circles at Evansville over a revolt which as sprung up against an order issued with the approval of Bishop Chatard to remove 1,000 bodies from the old Catholic Cemetery to the St. Joseph's Cemetery.

HON. WILLIAM H. ENGLISH, of Indianapolis, has purchased an elegant monument in Europe, to be placed over the grave of his father, Col. English, at Crown Hill Cemetery. It is forty feet high, and cost $7,000. The lot and fence cost $6,000.

STANFIELD P. FRAZIER has resigned as Deputy Clerk of the United States Court at Fort Wayne, the legal fraternity of the "Summit city" having made the position unprofitable (by sending their cases to Indianapolis) because an outsider was selected to fill it.

JUDGE JOHN G. DAVIS, of the Circuit Court at Jeffersonville, has decided that negroes and whites coming into the State and marrying cannot be convicted under the act of 1852, defining certain felonies and prescribing the penalties therefor, on the grounds that they are not residents of the State. This case has been exciting much interest, Howard (colored) having come from Louisville and married a white woman by the name of Leona Evans, three weeks ago. Howard was consequently discharged.

INDIANA has a larger school fund than any other State. It now amounts to considerably more than $9,000,000. This all loaned—nearly half of it to the State, drawing 6 per cent. interest, and the remainder to individual borrowers at 8 per cent., and the latter secured upon lands valued, without the improvements, at twice the amount loaned. No one loan exceeds $1,000. The fund is constantly being increased from $40,000 to $50,000 yearly by fines and forfeitures under the penal laws of the State. In addition to this permanent fund, the school property of the State was valued last year at $11,536,647.39. This year Prof. Smart, Superintendent of Public Instruction, estimates that it will amount to $12,000,000.

TEAS!

THE LOWEST THEY HAVE BEEN FOR TWENTY YEARS

When teas a few years ago sold at $1.50 and $2.00 per pound the extreme high prices almost kept the use of tea as a luxury; this is not so any longer. Teas are now relatively cheaper than coffee and the demand for them so increased the last five years that we now sell 2 and 3 chests daily. We keep up our usual motto of no middlemen. Our teas go direct to our customers and we purchase direct from importers, thereby saving them the three profits of the speculators, jobbers and wholesale merchant, which is at least 16 to 20c per lb.

Adam's Monument.

Of all the distinguished men who have lived and died, none have waited longer for monumental commemoration than Adam. Perhaps he could wait, since he was sure to be remembered for what he was, for what he did, and—above all—for what he didn't. Adam was the first man, the first husband, the first father, and for several hundred years he was the oldest inhabitant. Dispensing with the formalities of birth, teething, chicken pox, measels, whooping cough, he began existence as an able-bodied man, and his career was one of unprecedented success. Still, if he had received credit for what he didn't in proportion to the the credit received for what he did, he would have been given a place among the constellations by his pagan progeny and among the saints by his Christian posterity. He didn't play base-ball, walk for championship belts, or play the accordion; he didn't wear a velvet coat with wide braid, or go home late at night in a hack; and the life of a man who had the recitude not to do these things must have been adorned all through with praiseworthy omissions.

It is pleasant, therefore, to learn that the monument of Adam is to be erected in Elmira, one half of the cost of which has already been raised by subscription, without presenting the paper to any one outside the circle of the lineal descendants of the deceased patriarch. We are promised that there shall be an "appropriate inscription" on the shaft; but it is to be feared that in the exuberance of their filial feelings the residents of Elmira have not considered the difficulty of preparing an inscription appropriate for Adam's monument. The wanderer among the gravestones of those long dead seeks first the date of the hero's birth. But Adam was not born. What other line in the inscription can compensate for this disappointment? What shall satisfy the void in the hearts of the thousands who will read the name and wander forth inquiring, "Adam who?" These are but the beginning of the perplexing questions that will arise when the Elmira descendents of Adam sit down with paper and pencil to write out their inscription.

Why not, therefore, shun these difficulties by cutting deep into the shaft the first words, according to tradition, ever spoken on earth—those words in which Adam introduced himself to Eve: "Madam, I'm Adam?" His last words, unfortunately, have not been preserved; then let his first words be the inscription on his monument. The children from the lands where they read from right to left will come and spell out this reversible inscription and feel that their tasts have been consulted; and thus the nations of the earth will be drawn closer together at the foot of the monument reared to their common ancestor.

After the people of Elmira have built and unveiled their monument to Adam, they will merit and wear the palm for far-reaching fillial impulses—unless, indeed, their example shall lead the scientific persons of the Materialists school to rear a still taller and costlier shaft to the beloved memory of Protoplasm.—N. Y. Sun.

Three old gentlemen are sitting around a table on a steamboat, waiting to get another party to a game of cards. Presently they espy a nice-looking young fellow. One old party goes up to him and says:

"Pardon me, young man we want somebody to join us in a game of cards; would be happy to have you with us."

"Thanks; I never play cards."

"Take a drink with us?"

"Thanks; I never drink."

"Well, have a cigar"

"Thanks; I never smoke."

"Eh! Now I rather like that in a young man. Come into the cabin and I'll introduce you to my wife and daughters."

"Thanks," said the demure young man; "I shall never marry."

In Paris, the other Sunday, a young man and a middle-aged woman, coming from opposite directions, entered an open-cab on the Paris Boulevard at the same moment. Each gave an address to the driver, who, much perplexed, did not know what to do, for his fares began disputing each other's rights to the vehidle. An immense crowd quickly collected and manifested the greatest interest in the dispute. To add to the general mirth, a couple of policemen arrived, but each policeman took a different view—one championed the lady, the other the gentleman, and at intervals both abused the driver. The latter, being of a facetious turn of mind, kept the company in roars of laughter by his comments on the event. Finally the gentleman declared that, though he was on an errand of importance, and much pressed for time, he would yield to fair sex. So saying, he jumped out of the vehicle; but the lady, content, no doubt, with having strikingly asserted women's rights, quickly followed him, exclaiming that she was only on pleasure bent, and had she known—Her words were lost in the laughter that ensued, and, as both occupants of the cab had disappeared in the crowd, nothing was left for the cabby, whose humor somewhat suddenly turned from gay to grave, but to vent his displeasure by imprecations on the conduct of the policemen. The latter, however, retired in good order, in spite of the provoking jeers of the multitude.

The Old Dodge.

All the big republicans in the country are being invited to Louisiana to make speeches, and it is announced to be the intention to get them to stay until the election is over and the votes counted This old dodge wont work again, probably; the machinery is gone; the leading participants in the last count are all busy in the New Orleans custom house, where they no longer take the vote of the state to be changed, and John Sherman and Agues Jenks are engaged at Washington, and can not give their attention to small affairs like a state election in Louisiana.

Lawyer—"I see that this morning's paper accuses you of being a thief, a burglar, a pimp and a cut-throat."

Fellow—"The paper does give me away. I don't know what to do about it."

Lawyer—"My Lord! man, you don't intend to stand such accusations as those. Have you got any backbone in you? If you have you will never submit."

Fellow—"What shall I do?"

Lawyer—"Why, bring suit against the paper, fool."

Fellow—"That's a good idea. I'll give you my case."

Lawyer—"Sorry I can't take it; but m the attorney for the paper."

The reprint of the British Quarterly Review, for October, has been promptly issued by the LEONARD SCOTT PUBLISHING CO., 41 Barclay street, New York. We note the principal papers:

I. "Adolphe Monod: a biographical sketch." A work with this title recently published, has furnished the material of the present article, which gives an account of the life and writings of Monod.

II. "Irenæus." A continuation of the article on the doctrins of Irenæus, which appeared in the July number.

III. "Dr. Johnson." Recent editions of Boswell's life, and other works have given occasion to this article.

IV. "The Vatican and Civilization." A review of Father Curei's late work, "The Modern Dissension between the Church and Italy."

V. "What is Religion?" A sequel to the article, "What is Science?" in the January number of this review.

VI. "Political Prospects of Italy." A very elaborate statistical article, intended to show the political, social, moral and economical results of the first nine years of Italy's existence as an independent nation.

VII. "University Education in Ireland."

VIII. Contemporary literature. Careful notices of numerous recent publications.

Pause, Ponder and Peruse!

The invention of that Superior and Complete Sewing Machine (The Family Sewing Machine), marks one of the most important eras in the history of machinery and when we consider its great usefulness and extremely low price ($25). it is very difficult to conceive of any invention for domestic use of more or even equal importance to families. It has great capacity for work; beautiful, smooth, and quiet movement, rapid execution, certainty and delightful ease of operation, that at once commends it above all others The working parts are all steel, strong and durable, and will last a life time; the bobbins hold 100 yards of thread; the stitch is the firmest of all the stitches made, neat and regular, and can be regulated in a moment to sew stitches from an inch in length on coarse material down to the finest, so infinitesimal as to be hardly discernable with the naked eye, and with a rapidity rendering it impossible to count them as fast as made; it has more attachments than any other, and it does to perfection all kinds of heavy, coarse, plain, fine, or fancy needle-work with ease, and far less labor than required on other machines. It needs no commendation, the rapid sales, increasing demand and voluntary encomiums from the press, and the thousands of families who use them, amply testify to their undoubted worth as a standard and reliable household necessity, extending its popularity each day. Machines sent anywhere to be examined before any money is paid. Agents wanted by the Company, Address them for information. Family Sewing Machine Co., 755 Broadway, New York. 43-1y.

THANKSGIVING

Season has come again, and the prosperous and happy people of DeKalb county are preparing to enjoy the manifold blessings resulting from an abundant harvest. After giving thanks according to the established custom, the old, middle-aged, young men and boys will begin to inquire where they can buy winter clothing, of the latest styles, at low prices; and for their information the undersigned issues the following

PROCLAMATION.

Now, therefore, the proprietor of the Leading Merchant Tailoring and Gents' Furnishing Establishment in DeKalb county, proposes to convince the public that his stock of piece goods consisting of WORSTED SUITINGS, plain and fancy CASSIMERES, WOOL BEAVERS, CHEVIOTS and every variety of cloth for gents' wear usually kept in a first-class stock, exceeds anything ever before shown in the county. He further proposes to cut, fit and make dress and business suits, coats, pants, vests and all kinds of overcoats, at the lowest living prices.

N. B.---Ladies' Cloaks Cut, Fit and Made after the latest Fashion Plates.

HATS!

FOR MEN AND BOYS.

SPECIAL arrangements with wholesale dealers enable the proprietor to secure the very latest styles for fall and winter wear, as soon as the same appear in the market. His stock consists of all grades of SOFT and STIFF HATS and is so COMPLETE that customers can always find what they want. Get prices before you buy.

CAPS!

FOR EVERYBODY.

FINE FUR and SEAL SKIN CAPS for winter wear, in endless variety. Several new styles never before in the market. Farmers and their sons will find a full line of warm caps for out-door work that cannot be found elsewhere in this market and the prices guarantee quick sales.

GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS

Of every description, such as KNIT UNDERWEAR, LINEN SHIRTS, CUFFS and COLLARS, NECKTIES, WINDSOR SCARFS, SUSPENDERS, HALF-HOSE, KID GLOVES and MITS for dress and driving, silk handkerchiefs,---in fact, everything usually kept in a gents' furnishing establishment, all at prices that warrant an investigation.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, at Auburn, Ind., this 13th day of November, 1879.

G. H. YESBERA.

MY FATHER.

"Her father has been in prison."

The words reached me where I sat, and burned into my soul. Everywhere I looked I saw them; everywhere I turned I heard them.

Could I have been mistaken? Was all this self-torture for nothing? No; it was one of the proudest girls in school who had branded me with shame. I heard it from her own lips.

"I tell you Alice Vale's father has been in prison," she said, "and that's the reason I don't associate with her."

I had always been a shy sensitive girl, so exceedingly sensitive that some things were as hard to bear as actual pain, though they might have gone no further than words or motions. A smile ha[illegible] head to foot.

I once heard my mother say, in reply to some one who had noticed this peculiarity:

"Poor child! she can not help it;" and then, perhaps, conversation would follow, in a lower tone, which was not intended for my ear.

But, compared to the shock which thrilled me when I heard those dreadful words, I had never known what pain or trouble meant. They were like swords, and for few moments seemed to deprive me of all power of motion.

I can remember, to this day, the spot where I sat, for I had lingered after school to speak with the teacher. I can even now see the wooden desk that was [illegible] it strange, undecipher[illegible] on [illegible] cover, the [illegible] back, the sof[illegible] on the o[illegible] of [illegible] er [illegible] cur[illegible] lashes, as she sat at her desk, engrossed in [illegible]. She w[illegible] quite young, and very wise. The girls all loved her. I remember how mechanically my eyes sought her face for an indication that she had heard that dreadful speech, and then I said to myself, vehemently:

"It's a lie! a lie! a base, wicked, monstrous lie!"

[illegible] moments now. The scent of the wild brier outside the window seemed odious to me. The golden [illegible] that I had be[illegible] watching with so much delight, [illegible] charm.

Something cold and death-like seemed to be [illegible] through my veins. There was a [illegible] at my heart.

Once I wondered if I were dying, and st[illegible] out of a numbness that had s[illegible] my s[illegible], just as Miss Florian, [illegible] teacher, spoke.

"Wh[illegible] child," she [illegible] sweetly, "have [illegible] been w[illegible] the time? I had [illegible] forgotten." Then she added, [illegible] quick [illegible], "[illegible] you ill, Alice, or [illegible] it the sunset [illegible] that makes you so white?"

That sweet voice and sweeter smile went straight to my sore heart. I could not help it, my head fell on my hands, and I burst into tears. In a moment she was at my side, her cool hand on my head.

"Some-somebody has been saying something dreadful about me," I sobbed out, at last. "I heard it while I was [illegible]—but please don't ask me wh[illegible] it is, Miss [illegible]. I coul[illegible] tell y[illegible] ind[illegible] I couldn't, only it's [illegible] and shall hat[illegible] y Mo[illegible] I li[illegible]

"[illegible] it w[illegible] en," [illegible] looking down upon [illegible] it. Jenny's tongue has already made me trouble. It is rather case an unruly member, truly."

"Miss May, please, don't [illegible] it," I cried, almost passionately; "at least not [illegible]."

"Till you give me leave," she added, for my sobs choked me; "very well, [illegible], I will not speak till then, and now let us try to forget this unpleasant thing. Shall we go home together? We can talk as we go along."

To this I gladly assented, and that short walk and her sweet conversation acted like magic. How blue and cool the river was. And what lovely shadows seemed to slide down the sides of the high hills, taking their hues from the gorgeous tints of the sunset sky. If [illegible] had been a grief that could [illegible] I should have returned [illegible] home[illegible]ed.

"But alas! I had had [illegible] times without number [illegible] always been quite cle[illegible], an[illegible] honest in our house[illegible] story of prison shame—it [illegible] that I constantly assured me my father was a pattern [illegible] honor.

I bade Miss Florian May goo[illegible] ing at her own door, and walked on. We had talked of everything bright[illegible] beautiful, or, at least, she had, an[illegible] succeeded in winning my thou[illegible] away from myself for the time; but, a[illegible] I walked up the pretty shaded path t[illegible] my home, the grief all came back, and so vividly that I could not meet my mother's eye. So I stole up to my own room, and, with a heavy, heavy heart, sat down to think.

[illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] my [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] was [illegible] the hands, the same low, persuasive voice.

"My head aches," I said, in reply to her tender query, [illegible]

"Too hard work these hot days, for my little girl," she said, soothingly. "Papa must contrive to get a vacation for me."

Then she drew down the blinds and went out softly, presently returning. I think she had a suspicion that all was not right. If so, it was soon verified; for as I turned toward her she saw my red and swollen eyes.

"Why, Alice, my dear child; what has happened?" she asked, quite startled.

"This is something more than a headache."

In vain I refused. She insisted until, with my face hidden on her neck, I told her of the insulting words I ha[illegible]

There w[illegible] si[illegible]

"Your [illegible] nor[illegible]!" [illegible] exclaimed [illegible] in [illegible] vo[illegible]

"[illegible] ha[illegible]!"

Then [illegible] lie," [illegible] joyfu[illegible] was [illegible] ed, [illegible] I k[illegible] it was. And now I will tell Miss May and hope that girl will be punished for saying such miserable things."

I looked up in my mother's face. She was regarding me with a fixed, intent gaze. There were tears in her eyes, and her face was very sorrowful. Her silence oppressed, terrified me. All my old suspicions returned in full force. My heart sank again, and the pain returned.

"Ali[illegible] aid my mo[illegible], [illegible] I mu[illegible] e been [illegible] for[illegible] shook [illegible] little, and [illegible] re was [illegible] in he[illegible] that rec[illegible] to [illegible] sciou[illegible].

I sat upright [illegible] my [illegible] back with my hands. My forehead felt like coals of fire.

"Then, mamma," I said, with a great effort, "is it true—all that came thrillingly to my ears?"

"Alice, listen, and I will tell you all." She sat beside me, and put her arm round my waist, drawing me closer and closer as she talked.

"My dear, your father was in prison for six long and weary months."

I shivered—O, how cold I was! This information seemed the death-knell of all my hopes. I was too wretched to cry.

"But, dear, oh! it is more painful to me than you can ever imagine—he was wholly innocent. A sin had been laid to his charge, and so skillfully that no proof appeared wanting of [illegible] guilt. My darling, it was only a [illegible] months after my marriage that it all happened, and you can faintly imagine, with your [illegible], what I suffered. You [illegible] been, dear, while he was languishing [illegible] walls. But, Alice, we have a [illegible] stairs, signed by a dying man, which entirely exonerates your dear [illegible], for, though he might have [illegible] himself, he chose rather to suffer for [illegible] for one he loved. I shall [illegible] of this again, dear; you [illegible] when I tell you that the [illegible] of the true criminal, [illegible] have locked away—you shall [illegible]—was that of my only, [illegible] brother."

"[illegible] dear mother."

At that moment I became her comforter, for she was nearly overcome with the dreadful recital.

I never troubled myself about this [illegible], and something [illegible] I never knew what [illegible] clo[illegible] my [illegible] mother's lips, from that time forever after. [illegible] for my father, he was [illegible] my hero, and to me the greatest, [illegible]est of men.

A MODEL.

The English girl rides, walks, drives, rows upon the water, runs, dances, plays, [illegible], jumps the rope, throws the ball, hurls the quoit, draws the bow, keeps up the shuttlecock—and all this without having it pressed forever upon her mind that she is thereby wasting her time. She does this every day, until it becomes a habit which she will follow up through life. Her frame, as a natural consequence, is larger, her muscular system better developed, her nervous system in better subordination, her strength more enduring, and the whole tone of her mind healthier.

HOUSEHOLD HINTS.

ICE-C[illegible].—To [illegible] d th[illegible] p[illegible] c[illegible] mil[illegible] cu[illegible] gar, o[illegible] we[illegible] beat[illegible] oon [illegible] ra[illegible] of [illegible] vanill[illegible] nt into [illegible]ezer [illegible] cooking.

FRIED [illegible].—Two c[illegible] sugar, [illegible] cup[illegible] buttermilk, th[illegible]ggs, half [illegible] up o[illegible] butter or fried [illegible] fat, two [illegible]e-sp[illegible] of saleratus, any sea[illegible]ing [illegible] li[illegible]. Mix [illegible] enough to roll out.

A NICE TEA CAKE.—One-half cup of butter or cream; one of sugar; one egg; one-half cup [illegible] milk [illegible]; a teaspoonful of soda; handful of currants. Flour to the proper thickness.

TOMATO PICKLES.—Take one peck of [illegible] gathered [illegible] and half as many peppers; soak them in cold water twenty-four hours [illegible] cold, sharp vinegar [illegible] co[illegible] a[illegible] of [illegible] over a[illegible] on[illegible] vinegar. [illegible] pickl[illegible] w[illegible] keep [illegible] ye[illegible]

[illegible] CALICO, ETC.—To w[illegible] ck [illegible], [illegible] colored [illegible] or fancy hose, wash in cold water from first to last, and the colors will not run or fade. Dry in the shade. This method was adopted by the old-colored [illegible] dresses of the South, and was the secret of their success.

CLEANING SILVER-SPOONS.—The disagreeable discoloration of egg can be readily taken from silver spoons by washing them in potato water—water in which potatoes have been boiled. It is much better than salt, as it does not scratch the metal. The taste of fish may be removed very effectually from steel knives and forks by rubbing them with fresh orange or lemon peel.

FOR THE TOILET.—Of white wax, oil of almonds, spermaceti and white soap each one-fourth ounce; one pint of rose water or elder-flower water, [illegible] cologne, three ounces. Cut the wax, sperm[illegible] soap very fine, put in an earthen vessel with a gill of rosewater, set into a dish of boiling water [illegible] stand [illegible] dissolved. Then add first the oil of almonds, then the rosewater and cologne.

OVERHANGING TREES.—There are sometimes unpleasant feelings arising from fruit trees standing near and overhanging the boundary lines. In such cases the law is that the tree and its fruit belongs wholly to the one on whose land the trunk stands, and he has a right to pick his fruit from his neighbor's side. If "on the line," the tree and fruit are to be equally divided.

TOMATO CATCHUP.—Wash green tomatoes and slice them rather thin; weigh them; allow three or four sliced onions, or not as preferred, four pounds of sugar and a gallon of cider vinegar to eight pounds of tomatoes. Put the vinegar to boil [illegible] in [illegible] the [illegible] when [illegible] boils [illegible] set [illegible] and a few minutes un[illegible] re[illegible] without [illegible] the vinegar [illegible] s[illegible] spoonfuls of salt, a table-spoonful each of powdered cinnamon and cloves and a grated nutmeg; then set it on the fire and immediately add the tomatoes. When the vinegar begins to simmer, press the tomatoes gently down. Let them boil only two or three minutes. Put them into covered jars; or, when [illegible]. When the pickles are all used, the vinegar need not be lost, as it is excellent upon baked beans, and cold salt meat or in minced pies, etc.

A SAWFISH weighing 608 pounds and bearing a saw four feet long, was caught at Charleston, S. C.

STORIES OF THE FORTY-NINERS

Told by One of the Number—The "Digging" Times on the Pacific Slope Thirty Years Ago.

"Yes, those were lively times, now you can bet. No man told you you lied without passing in his checks right off," said William E. Goodyear, when questioned by the reporter of the Register yesterday in regard to the thrilling times of '49, the first year of the gold fever in California. "No man went without his six shooter and bowie. Why, my man, to go through some streets, stretching maybe—well, let's see, say from the corner of State to Orange street, without your old shooter in your hand, would be as much as your precious life was worth. The man you met on the street of this kind held his pistol with as little concern as you would hold that cane going up street," said he, tapping the reporter's cane with his fingers. "You see everybody was crazy after gold and bound to have their rights preserved if he had to kill men for it, and it was a good thing, and had the effect of giving rise to a sort of law, which, to be sure, was a 'leetle' tough, yet, at the same time, a man was sure to have his belongings preserved. Why, a man could, with perfect safety leave his pan of gold in full view, without fear of its being taken."

"How is that?"

"Because your neighbor knew that if he touched it his life wasn't worth the asking. Then, again, every one had a claim of their own, and they were too much engrossed with their own business to mind yours."

"That reminds me of a good story, and one from which you can get a pretty good idea of the state of affairs out there in Los Angelos at that time. A man named Dickerson and his family came out there and settled on a claim, which he considered his, and which all the boys conceded to be his. He had lived on it for a long time, and no one had disputed his claim, so he, with the advice of the boys, determined to hold on to it. Well to get around to the story a little faster, because I haven't got very much time to talk, a family named Somers came out there, and asked the privilege of occupying a little corner of the claim. Well, Dick, he was a little 'skeery,' but finally decided he would. So the Somers' settled themselves and became the means of a lively muss. After they had lived there for a couple of years Somers undertook to claim that he owned the portion he had been living on; whereupon Dick—and he was a trump—went to the justice of the peace about it. The justice said he would have a trial, and proceeded to get a jury. Ordinarily, you know, Judge Lynch would have settled the affair, but Dick he wanted the square thing done, so he went in for a jury. Well, the way that jury was picked out was a great business. It was: 'Here Bill, you serve,' and 'Hallou, Jim, you are on the jury.' Well, we got a jury, and the trial was a pretty fair example of western courts at that time. The justice, not very much of a lawyer at the best, turned one of the bar-rooms of the place into a court-room and prepared for business. I was on the jury, so you see I know what I am telling you. Somers he urged his claim and got Dick pretty mad, so what did Dick do but put his hand in his pocket, draw a six-shooter out, 'bang, bang,' quick as a flash, and Somers rolled over. Then a fellow named Anderson, who was a friend of Dick's and a friend of mine, came in to have a hand in the muss, and keep an eye open for Dick. But before he could do a thing or really take in the situation, young Somers, a brother of the fellow Dick killed, drew his six-shooter and shot Anderson. He fell back into my arms. Pretty quick he made a tremendous brace, kinder raised himself up, and says 'look out, Bill, I'll finish him yet,' and by gum he did. He shot the cuss right through the head. Well, things were taking a pretty lively turn, when a sister of Dick's came in through the door, and with a fourteen inch bowie in her hand slashed through the crowd, covered the old man with her body and said, 'Come along, old man, this ain't no place for you.' Well, he went, and there were no Somers of any account left to press the claim; Dick came out all right, and held on to his land. Yes, siree, those were thrilling times, now you can bet.'

Mr. Goodyear told this story with an earnestness which displayed some of the fire and nerve which he showed he had still left after years of later life in this more peaceful section of the country.

"Oh! I could tell you stories like that all the afternoon. I get all worked up thinking of the old time and the boys I used to be with.

"I used to have a fellow with me named Texas. By George he was a tearer, and the ugliest looking sinner you ever saw. Yet Texas was a good fellow. Why, that fellow had a scar on his face extending from his right eye diagonally across his face, cutting right through his lips and chin. And when he was mad he looked lightning. There was a girl out there the boys knew as Sib, and you can be assured she wasn't afraid of anyone. She and her old man came out there from St. Louis, where he had murdered some one and was obliged to get out. The old fellow ran a ranch there and sold a little of everything in the liquor line as well as in other lines. He didn't dare to move out of the house very far without running a great risk of being shot by some one, or arrested, so Sib used to go to 'Frisco and provide things when it was neccessary. Well, one time when Sib went to an adjoining town, there happened to be a ball in progress. Texas and myself of course took it in, and Sib was there. At that time I did not know her at all, but it seems that Texas had heard of her and she of him, although they were not acquainted. There were a good many stranger boys at the ball, who made themselves rather conspicuous; and annoying to Sib. Finally, getting a little tired of the sport they were enjoying at her hands, she walked up to one of them and said she would make it hot for them if they persisted in that sort of business. Texas, in the meantime, had watched the progress of the affair, and, seeing that Sib was a good deal annoyed at their proceedings, so much so that she had spoken to them, he walked up to her and says, 'Sib, you are right about these fellows; I will back you up. Let me take care of these fellows.' With that he walked away with the girl and in a few moments returned to where the strangers were standing, having his six-shooter in one hand and his fourteen inch bowie knife in the other. After looking them all over he quickly but business-like remarked: 'You fellows 'dbetter get out of here just as soon as your legs will carry you. Do you sabe?' Well, with a six-shooter pointed at their heads and a bowie brandished at their faces, they were not very long in getting out of the way. Sib had always said that she wouldn't marry a man who hadn't killed his man at some time or other, but as Texas had done that time and time again there could be no objection to him from that quarter. From that time they took a fancy to each other. How she fancied such an ugly looking fellow as he was I never could tell, but she did. Next day he went and saw her and said he wanted to be spliced to her. She said all right, but when he wanted to be married by a padre she said she didn't want to be spliced by any padre, she wished a justice of the peace to do the business. Then Texas came to me and said, 'Capt. Bill, when are you going away?' 'To-morrow night,' says I. 'Now, look ahere, Captain, I want to have you stay over until next day, 'caus I am going to be spliced to Sib and I want to have you give the bride away.' 'What,' says I, 'are you going to marry Sib?' 'Well, I just am,' Texas answered, and by the powers he did. On the day after the wedding I made all my preparations to start and went around to see Sib and get Texas. "Well, good by, Texas, I don't know how the old man will take the news, but I guess he won't care. I'll send you word when you and Capt. Bill come back.' 'Good-bye, Texas,' said Sib. 'Good-by,' replied Texas, and we started off. We were gone away about six weeks I guess looking after our duties. I was a surveyor out there, you know, and had some thirty-five men with me, and then returned to Borodina. There we found a letter from Sib, who stated in it that the old man said he had no objection to Texas or any one else she wanted to pick out for a husband, but he didn't want him around his premises, fooling with his gal until his bones were laid away. When that time came he didn't care what did happen, but until then he did advise the husband to steer clear. 'Well, what are you going to do about it, Texas?' I asked. 'I think, Capt. Bill, that I will go there and see how the thing is working.' 'But the old man may draw a bead on you,' I suggested. 'Well, don't you worry about that, Bill. He won't get very much the better of me you can bet.' We returned to Los Angelos, and on the first day, after the boys had wandered around the town, Texas says: 'Bill, let's go round to the house and see Sib, and kinder feel the old man.' I didn't object to that, so I consented. We mounted our horses, and started for the house. When we were within about 200 yards of the house the old man appeared armed with his long rifle. Texas turned around to me, and says, 'Bill, let's close the gap a little.' We gradually closed it until we were within seventy-five yards of the old fellow, when he raised his rifle and says, 'Don't come a step further, or you're a dead man.' Well, I didn't know quite what to make of the situation, so I turned to him and say, 'Come, boy, let's get a little nearer,' but we hadn't got ten inches before it became pretty evident that he meant business, and would shoot me if he got the idea. 'Hallos, old man, what's the matter with you?' cried out Texas. 'Aha, it's you, is it, Texas? Well, I am sorry, I hain't got no objection to you, but you can't come any nearer until my bones are laid away forever, and that's d—certain.' 'I guess we will have to fix him,' Texas quietly remarks. Just at this time Sib, the girl herself, came out of the house, 'Hallos, Texas,' the girl cried out. 'Hallao, Sib,' came back from Texas. 'Don't come any nearer, Texas, or he'll kill you.' At this point it got very lively, and Texas had just about made up his mind to 'finish the old customer.' Texas was armed with one of these long pistols, and you know they shoot like a rifle, when Sib threw her arms around her dad's neck and says, 'Dad, can't Texas come any nearer?' 'No, girl, no; and if you start for him, I'll put a bullet through your heart quicker than a wink, and I guess you know me well enough to know that I'll do it.' 'By hokey, if that girl wasn't hanging so near the old man, and I wasn't afraid of hitting her, I'd let drive in a minute,' I remarked to Texas. 'Now you hold off, I'll fetch him yet,' said Texas, at the same time cocking his pistol. 'Can he come further?' asked Sib. 'No,' grunted out the old man. Sib threw up her hand, shoved the rifle aside and called out 'go ahead, Texas.' Well, you can bet he fired. Bang, bang, bang, three shots and the old man fell over dead. 'There, we will see if I can't have my wife,' was the only remark made by Texas. We drove up to the house, went in, closed the door, and had just as nice a time as you ever saw. After a while I told Texas I would go and see the undertaker and have the body taken away. I went to his store, but he wasn't in, but I heard he was down to the hotel. I rode ahead and found him sitting there in the vestibule reading the paper. I told him the old man was dead, and that I wanted some one to move the body. 'Did you kill him?' he asked. 'No, but a friend of mine did.' 'All right,' he said. Well, the body was removed and buried in the lot, and I paid the burial expenses. The result was that Texas got his wife. the old man had his bones laid away, and I went there a great many times afterward and passed a great many pleasant evenings with the two, I haven't heard of him in two years, but I would like to see the dare-devil."

Chicago and Northwestern Railroad.

There is possibly no link in the great railway chain, stretching across the American Continent, from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific slope, that forms so material a part of that great continental railroad and is of such importance as the Chicago and Northwestern railroad, running from the metropolis, Chicago, to the Missouri river at Omaha. In its construction from Chicago westward it was the first to connect with the Union Pacific, virtually making that road practicable, and well deserves the title it won of the "Old Pioneer." It had hard work as it forced its way over the then unsettled but fertile prairies of the states of Illinois and Iowa, but being the shorter or inside route and actually having less gradients or curvatives than its rivals to Council Bluffs, its records show achievements in speed, safety, regularity and reliability unsurpassed, if equalled by any competing line.

Its improvements in the last two or three years have been simply remarkable, and the changes the most wonderful ever wrought in the east or west, in its roadway, rails and general equipment. It is now strictly first class, the model railroad, gravel ballasted, with steel rails, stone culverts, iron bridges, white oak ties, superior engines, airy and elegant coaches, supplied with the Miller couplings and Westinghouse steam brakes and attachments, in the shape of what have been called "marvels of splendor," the Pullman palace hotel cars, in which the traveller eats and sleeps in the most luxurious apartments with all the comforts and conveniences of a well stocked home. The matchless tracks and the scientific outfit of this road are triumphs of art in railway construction. But in addition to its excellency of construction, it enjoys the signal advantages of natural location and a management that, from the highest official to the most subordinate employee, most sedulously cares for the convenience and satisfaction of its patrons. During the past year it was without a terminal detention, and such is the increase of its freight and travel that a double track is accessitated. The development of the road is marvelous—iron rails in 1865, steel rails in 1875, and steel rails and a double track in 1879.

The Chicago and Northwestern Railroad operates nearly 2,200 miles of road (the exact figures being 2,188) and reaches nearly every important point in Northern Illinois, Wisconsin, Northern Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, running many miles into Dakota. It transports millions of passengers annually, and its freight carriage is simply enormous. From Chicago, westward, you can trace its California line, until you touch the Missouri river at Council Bluffs, opposite Omaha, a single run of nearly 500 miles. Northwestward, through Madison, the capital of Wisconsin, and through the pine woods of that state into Minnesota, 400 miles more. Again looking from Chicago, you can trace a line through Sparta, Wisconsin, La Crosse in the same state. Winona, Owatonna and New Ulm, in Minnesota, and northwestward far into Dakota, 625 miles more of road. Again, coming to Chicago, we see two lines running northwardly—one along the lake shore to Milwaukee and thence to Fond du Lac, and the other running more inland through Janesville, Watertown, etc., also to Fond du Lac, thence north through Oshkosh, DePere, Green Bay and Escanaba to Negaunee, Ishpeming and Marquette—another 440 miles of road. Then we have a line from Chicago to Elgin, Rockford and Freeport; another from Clinton, Ia., to Anamosa, in the same state; another from Kenosha, on Lake Michigan to Rockford, in Northern Illinois.

Passengers to or from California, Colorado, Utah, Nebraska, the Black Hills, Minnesota, Manitoba, the east, west, north or south, should see that they are furnished tickets by this great line. No other road has Pullman or any other form of hotel car.

Considering the vast area of territory tracked by this road, the number of trains daily running, the freight and passenger business it transacts, its main lines and ramifications, its equipment, its celebrated hotel cars, and in short the character of its entire outfit, the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad eminently deserves the title of one of our grandest trunk lines.—Daily Graphic, New York. May 21st, 1879.

The Edinburgh Review for October has just been reprinted by the Leonard Scott Publishing company., 41 Barclay Street, N. Y. The first article, 'Germany since the peace of Frankfort," is a severe criticism of Bismark's political career; admits that he has founded a German Empire, but insists that he has lowered the character and intelligence of the German nation. The second article, "Mozart," considers the character of the composer a man and a musician.

Other papers of interest are "Spedding's Life of Bacon;" an account of the "Family of Mirabeau," from the year 1207 to 1794; "Froude's Cæsar;" "The code of criminal law;" and "Afghanstan."

Perhaps the most attractive articles are those on "The Philosophy of Color" and "The Civil Engineers of Britain." In the course of it Capt. Ericsson's magnificent work, entitled "contributions to the Centennial Exhibition," in which his labors for the third century are recorded, is admitted to be far superior to English mechanical publications in the bold style and high finish of the drawings; and "much of the high position which America now occupies in engineering skill and efficiency is due to this illustrious engineer."

A jury in the New York city court disagreed, and when Judge McCue inquired, "How do you stand, gentlemen?" the foreman replied: "Your honor there are six of us on one side and four on the other; one is on both sides and one didn't vote." Judge jurors and spectators were convulsed with laughter, but the foreman was unable to "see the joke."

No Money to Pay until Machine is Delivered to you and Examined.

It makes the shuttle, double-thread, lock-stitch, (the same on both sides of the work), which received the highest reward at the Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia, Pa., 1876. And is complete with a larger assortment of attachments for fine work than any other machine, and reduced to only $25.

It is an easy and pleasant machine to operate, requires the least care, produces every variety of work, and will last until the next century begins. Strong, simple, rapid and efficient.

Use it once and you will use no other. The money cheerfully refunded if it will not outwork and outlast any machine at double the price.

Agents sell them faster than any other in consequence of their being the "best at the lowest price."

Each machine throughly warranted with written guarantee for five years. Kept in order free of charge; money refunded at once if not satisfactory.

It is the most solid, reliable, and satisfactory machine ever invented for all kinds of family work. It is an acknowledged unexceptional mechanical success, thoroughly tested and used in thousands of homes. An efficient, silent, rapid, reliable and ever-ready helper to the weary wife or seamstress, it will do the work of a family for a lifetime, or it will earn from $4 to $5 per day for any one who wishes to sew for a living. This machine costs less than half the price of any new machine of like quality. Has extra long, large-sized shuttle, easily removed. Extra large-sized bobbins, holding 100 yards of thread, doing away with the frequent rewinding of bobbins. It is built for strength and constant hard work. Interchangeable working parts, manufactured of fine polished steel. Will run for years without repairs; is simple to learn, easy to manage, understood perfectly in an hour, and always ready in a moment to do every description of heavy or fine work, at less cost or trouble than any other machine at any price ever did or can do. It will sew anything a needle can pierce, from lace or cambric to heavy cloth or harness, with any kind of thread, and will run off twenty yards per minute; it uses strong, straight needles, and never breaks them It cannot miss or drop a stitch, ravel or break the thread. If you have any other machine, buy this and have a better one. The ease and rapidity of its motion and quality of its work, are its best recommendations. It will hem, fell, tuck, braid, cord, bind, gather, quilt, ruffle, pleat, fold, scallop, shirr, roll, baste, embroider, run up braids, etc., with elegance, ease and quickness, unsurpassed by any machine ever invented.

BEWARE OF IMPOSITION.

The price for our new machines are less than those asked by dealers in second-hand, rebuilt and refinished machines, or those selling out old stock to close up business, many such inferior and old style machines being offered as new at reduced prices; beware of imposition and only buy new machines. There are no new first-class machines offered as low as the "FAMILY," by many dollars.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

A Lowell, Mass., dispatch reports that three persons were drowned in the Merrimac river, near Lawrence mills. Mr. and Mrs. Peter Little, two children, and Mr. and Mrs. James Brown were rowing from the Centralville shore to Little Canada, when the leaking of the boat frightened them, and in the confusion they overturned it. Mr. Brown swam ashore. Mrs. Little and one child clung to the boat, and were rescued. Mr. Little and Mrs. Brown (his sister), and a boy aged 2 years, son of Little, were drowned. The bodies have all been recovered.

Stilson Hutchins, formerly of the Dubuque Herald, lately of the St. Louis Times, and more lately of the Washington Post, has purchased the Manchester (N. H.) Union, with the intention of making it the recognized organ of the Democratic party of New Hampshire.... Richard Schell, a prominent New York financier, and for many years a leading Tammany Democrat, is dead.

THE WEST.

Gen. Hooker's obsequies at Cincinnati, on the 7th inst., were largely attended and very impressive. In the procession were many veterans, several military organizations, and prominent State and Federal officials. An army chaplain preached the funeral sermon, which was an eloquent and patriotic discourse.

As a stock train of cars was crossing the North Missouri railroad bridge, which spans the Missouri river at St. Charles, Mo., a few nights ago, the west span of the main structure suddenly gave way, precipitating seventeen cars of live stock and the caboose into the abyss. The engine and one car, with the conductor, engineer and fireman, were saved by the breaking of the connection between the cars. Three cattle men who had taken passage on the train were drowned, and three others were badly injured.

Fire has laid waste a large portion of Napoleon, a thriving town in Northwestern Ohio and the county seat of Henry county. Nearly all the business part of the town was burned, including the Court House and county offices, and the loss is estimated at $100,000.

A horrible double murder, followed by the swift lynching of one of the perpetrators, is reported from Todd county, Minn. A feud sprung up between John Coldale and another man whose name is not given, living on a farm, on the one side, and two bachelor brothers, John and Michael Moede, who cultivated an adjoining farm, on the other. One night Coldale's house was burned, and he and his fellow-workman were missing, with every evidence that they had been murdered. Suspicion rested on the Moedes. One of them fled, but John was arrested, confessed the deed, told where the bodies were concealed, and said that his brother Michael assisted in the horrible crime. The bodies were found, as stated by him, wrapped in a sheet and buried in the brush. The horribly-mutilated remains presented a most sickening sight. This was more than the enraged citizens could stand, and the prisoner was taken from the jail by the mob and hanged to a tree.

Mrs. McCook, the mother of the celebrated fighting McCooks, of Ohio, died recently at her home in New Lisbon, Ohio.

Gen. Grant has authorized a denial of the story that he had been offered the Presidency of the Pennsylvania railroad.

THE SOUTH.

A horrible suicide was that of Mrs. John Donovan, of Memphis. She poured kerosene over her clothing, and then deliberately set fire to herself, and fought desperately with those who endeavored to extinguish the flames. She resisted until her person, from her knees up, was literally burned to a crisp, the flesh leaving the bones bare. Strange to say, she lived long enough to make a will and explain the cause that impelled her to such a rash deed—domestic troubles. Her husband, Col. John Donovan, was a prominent citizen of Memphis, and gained some notoriety last summer by fleeing from the yellow fever, and refusing to come to the bedside of his family when stricken by the plague.

Affairs are still in a terrible condition in the mountains of Eastern Kentucky. No one who was in any way friendly to the Underwoods is safe, and the reign of terror is so complete no one dare attempt an indictment of the outlaws in the courts, which have just adjourned. In Rowen and other counties people are organizing against the regulators, and determined efforts are being made to bring the outlaws to justice.... Kentucky killings: In Letcher county, Town Marshal Lane was shot dead while standing in his yard by William Vermillion, who stood in the yard 100 yards off, and took deliberate aim; it was the result of an old feud. In Wolf county, Crocket H. McGuire, while sleeping in a house near Campton, was either murdered and then burned with the house, or suffocated in the flames. At Pine Hill, Robert Randall, manager of a coal mine, shot and killed Price Price, a miner.

Frankfort, Ky., was the scene, the other day, of a double murder of great atrocity. A blacksmith shop having burned mysteriously, search was made in the ruins, which resulted in the discovery of the remains of a man and a boy. The owner of the place and his employes were promptly lodged in jail. The theory is that they were discovered by the lad in the act of putting the man to death, and that, to hide their crime they killed him also.

WASHINGTON.

The Sacs and Foxes, together with a delegation from the Iowa tribe of Indians, have left Washington for their homes on the Nemaha reservation, in Kansas and Nebraska. They have been convinced it is better for them to remain where they are than to move into Indian territory.... A Washington dispatch announces the death of Mrs. Eaton, widow of Gen. John H. Eaton, who was Secretary of War under President Jackson.

A Washington telegram states that the proposal of the Government to purchase $10,000,000 of bonds on the sinking-fund account was responded to by offers to sell over $11,000,000 of bonds at prices varying from 105.59 to 110. Secretary Sherman rejected all the bids, and directed Assistant Treasurer Hillhouse not to pay over 106 for any bonds. A large number of New York bankers then came forward and offered to sell their 6 per cent. bonds at the figure named by the Secretary of the Treasury, and in a short time the Assistant Treasurer had completed the purchase of $10,000,000 of them.

The indications are that the receipts from internal revenue and customs for the present month will be several millions in excess of the disbursements of the Government. This will enable Secretary Sherman to make additional purchases of bonds for the sinking fund.

President Hayes has announced his intention of appointing Gen. Halbert E. Paine, at present Commissioner of Pensions, to the vacant District Commissionership.

Postmaster General Key has commenced a fresh and vigorous war against the lottery companies. Evidence has been accumulating in the Postoffice Department, going to show that the whole lottery system in the United States is a swindle. The law office of the department has been for more than one year conducting an investigation into the methods of business of the various lottery companies, and the evidence furnished by answers to letters and by affidavits is deemed sufficient to warrant proceeding to extinguish against the so-called respectable lottery establishments. The Postmaster General has therefore ordered the preparation of orders to the Postmasters at New York, Louisville and New Orleans, directing them to return registered letters, and refuse the payment of money orders addressed to parties concerned in the lottery business.

GENERAL.

Gen. Sherman has forwarded to the Secretary of War the reports of Capts. Payne and Dodge, the former giving a detailed description of the Thornburgh fight and the subsequent defense till relief came in the person of Gen. Merritt, and the latter telling of his movements in going to the aid of the beleaguered soldiers of the Thornburgh command. Gen. Sherman adds words of high commendation of the coolness and courage of both and the bravery of their men.

The Chairman of the Cuban Revolutionary Committee in New York furnishes a plausible explanation of the continued shipment of troops to the island from Spain. He declares that all the eastern provinces of the island are overrun by insurgents, numbering 5,000, all well armed and under competent leadership. Each Spanish proclamation announcing the extinction of the rebellion is accompanied by the departure of a few regiments of regulars.... The wife of Senator David Davis, of Illinois, died at Lenox, Mass., at the residence of her sister, a few days ago. Senator Davis, son and daughter were present. The deceased had been ill for some time.

An inspection of the latest reports from the Postmasters of all the prominent cities of the United States shows the remarkable fact that the postoffice at Chicago did more business last year than any other in the country, except New York.

A gang of swindlers are operating through New England, securing the notes of farmers in payment for wares that are never delivered, the notes being disposed of promptly at a discount. It is charged that the operations of the gang are directed by a wealthy business man in Michigan. Farmers throughout the West would do well to be on the lookout, for they will almost surely be visited by these swindlers as soon as they are driven out of the New England States.

News comes by way of San Antonio, Texas, that a desperate fight took place in Chihuahua, Mexico, between a band of Indians, numbering about 200, and a party of fifty citizens from Carisea, New Mexico. Thirty-two citizens were killed, only eighteen escaping alive and wounded. The Indians were the same Maj. Morrow had been after. They came from the Uintah mountains. The party which found them was surprised by the Indians, who occupied a position where they had great advantage. These Indians have killed over 200 persons within the past six weeks.

POLITICAL.

A call has been issued for a meeting of the National Republican Committee to be held at Washington Dec. 17, to take appropriate action upon the death of the Hon. Zach Chandler, and to consider the time and place of holding the next National Convention.... Advices from Lansing, Mich., indicate that the vacant seat in the United States Senate by the death of Mr. Chandler, is likely to be filled by the Legislature instead of the Governor's appointment, as Gov. Croswell expresses himself as decidedly in favor of calling an extra session to consider this and other matters of pressing importance.

The following is the total vote cast in New York city for Governor and Lieutenant Governor: For Governor—A. B. Cornell, Republican, 46,135; L. Robinson, Democrat, 64,906; John Kelly, Bolter, 42,270. For Lieutenant Governor—George G. Hoskins, Republican, 50,128; Clarkson N. Potter, Democrat, 98,675.... The vote of Allegheny county, Pa., containing Pittsburgh, was, for State Treasurer: Butler, Republican, 17,913; Barr, Democrat, 11,199; Sutton, Greenback, 1,435; Richardson, Prohibition, 78.

The vacancy in the United States Senate caused by the death of Mr. Chandler has been filled by the appointment of Hon. Frederick C. Beaman, of Adrian. Judge Beaman was a Representative in Congress from Michigan for five successive terms, 1860-70. He is a native of Vermont, has resided in Michigan forty-one years, and is 66 years old.

THE GRANT RECEPTION AT CHICAGO.

The reception of Gen. Grant by the citizens of Chicago, to which many days of preparation had been devoted, was everything that the most devoted admirer of the ex-President could have desired or asked for. The people of the city turned out by the hundreds of thousands and were reinforced by hundreds of thousands from abroad, so that there was no lacking in numbers; of enthusiasm there was also an abundance, and the procession was the largest, the finest, and the best gotten-up affair of the kind perhaps ever witnessed in the West. From the Chicago papers we condense the following account of the reception exercises:

The train bearing the distinguished visitor, which came over the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road from Galena, arrived at Park row, on the lake front, at 1 o'clock p. m. The rain began to pour down, but the thousands of people who thronged the Lake park and all the adjacent streets did not seem to heed it in the least, but pressed forward to get as near as possible to Gen. Grant's carriage. In spite of the disagreeable weather, the decorations, the gay uniforms of the militia, the thousands of wagons carrying flags and mottoes, and the smoke from booming batteries on the lake front, presented a scene at once beautiful and grand. Haste was made to set the huge procession in motion. The rain pouring down in torrents made this a matter of great difficulty, but finally the column began to move down Michigan avenue, which was crowded with moist spectators from one end to the other, as far as the line of march extended. By-and-by the sky cleared, the sun came out and made everything infinitely brighter. The militia led, followed by all the veteran organizations; then came the civic societies with a large number of carriages, and finally the fire department, with thousands of vehicles of every description, with all sorts of mottoes. The head of the column had reached a long distance down town before the wagons had fallen into line. The police had great difficulty in clearing the way. Grant was everywhere greeted with the most vociferous cheering. As the procession moved down town toward Washington, State and Lake streets, the jam of human beings became, if possible, greater than ever. By 2 o'clock the head of the procession passed the corner of Washington street and Fifth avenue. The sky was now perfectly clear, and the streets along which the parade passed were literally impassable. Every available inch of standing room on sidewalks and steps was occupied, and every window had its spectators.

The South Side, in the neighborhood of the Palmer House, was the destination of visitors and residents alike. From early morning until noon, from all sections of the city, there was a rush to the section named. At noon, on State street, from Lake street up to Harrison, there was a perfect jam. Once in the crowd, it was an utter impossibility to advance or recede.

Not only was the street packed, but the windows were black with human heads.

This crowd was not confined to State street, but all along the line of the procession the streets were densely packed, while every window, every roof, every housetop was crowded by spectators to its very utmost.

The procession, as seen from State and Washington street, was grand and imposing beyond description. As far as the eye could reach flags fluttered to the breeze from every window and point of vantage. The fronts draped in bunting—the red, white and blue—showed that the city had put on holiday attire. The sidewalks and streets were blocked with people, crowded so closely together that passage was impossible—a vast multitude, in which the movement of individuals was scarcely perceptible—a closely-packed throng, which was hardly stirred at the approach of the riders, and which constantly threatened to verge upon and precipitate itself upon the procession. Standing for hours, many of them in the mud and water that had collected from the rain, every head was turned and every neck was craned forward, as the head of the grand army made its appearance as it moved north from Washington street. A cry went up from the throng in the street that was echoed from the windows and porches, also black with people—cheers that drowned the music of the bands, the trampling of the horses and the tread of the rapidly-marching host—voices that were hoarse with long waiting and standing in the water and mud, and that rose and swelled in volume as the contagious enthusiasm spread instantaneously through the throng.

As the carriage in which Gen. Grant sat, facing Hon. Thos. Hoyne and Mayor Harrison, made its appearance, drawn by six horses and guarded by a platoon of police on each side, the vast multitude broke into a cheer that extended all along the street, in a universal, hoarse, deep-throated, shout of welcome.

As the shout went up all along the long route, Gen. Grant raised his tall silk hat, and, bowing silently, kept his head uncovered for a few minutes. As soon as he had replaced it, another shout would again cause him to repeat the operation. He wore a heavy black overcoat, with nothing about him to indicate his distinguished position as the guest of the city.

A clear, ruddy color in the face, the beard but slightly grizzled, the hair hardly tinged with gray, the face without a wrinkle or furrow perceptible from the street, Gen. Grant looked in the very prime of manhood and vigor.

On the arrival of the long procession at the Palmer House, the General was met by the Reception Committee of 500 prominent citizens of Chicago, and Carter H. Harrison, Mayor, made a speech of welcome. After the conclusion of Mayor Harrison's short welcoming address, Gen. Grant stepped to the front of the balcony, and, in a low voice, unheard by a large majority of the large crowd, spoke as follows:

Mr. Mayor, and Gentlemen of the Committee of the Chicago Reception, and Gentlemen of Chicago and of Illinois:

I feel very much honored by the welcome which I am receiving at your hands to-day. I feel highly honored by the speech of welcome that has just been uttered by your worthy Mayor. It is something so personal to myself that it would hardly be in good taste for me to respond to the language of it, and it leaves, therefore, nothing further for me to do than to repeat my thanks to this committee and to the citizens of this city for the hearty reception which they have given me.

In regard to one allusion to my reception abroad, I will say that in every case I felt that it was a tribute to our own country. I will add, further, that our country stands differently abroad, in the estimation of Europeans and the Eastern nations, from what it did a quarter of a century ago. An American citizen is regarded in a different light from an American citizen of one-quarter of a century ago. At that time it was believed that we had not a nation—that we were a mere confederation of States, tied together by a rope of sand that would give way upon the slightest friction. They have found out their grand mistake. They know that we have now a Government, that we are a nation, and that we are a strong, intelligent and brave people, capable of judging, and knowing our rights, and determined on all occasions to maintain them against either domestic or foreign foes. That is the explanation of the reception which you have received, through me, while abroad. Gentlemen, I thank you.

The remarks were received with loud and long-continued applause. After a short informal reception and a shake of the hand with a few personal friends, the General was driven to the residence of Col. Fred Grant, where he took dinner with a family party.

In the evening, a brilliant reception was tendered to Gen. Grant by the Army of the Tennessee, headed by Gen. Sherman at Haverly's Theater. The theater was magnificently decorated. The exercises were opened by prayer by Rev. Dr. Thomas, followed by Hon. E. B. Washburne, who delivered the main address of welcome. Speeches of welcome were also delivered by Gov. Cullom and Mayor Harrison. Gen. Sherman then delivered an address in response, in behalf of the Army of the Tennessee, after which Gen. Gresham delivered the annual address of the society. A flag was presented to the society by Gen. Logan, on behalf of the Citizens' Committee. Gen. Sherman responded in a brief speech, and introduced Gen. Grant, who spoke as follows:

Comrades of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee: After an absence of several years from the gatherings of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee, it affords me heartfelt pleasure to again see you, my earliest comrades in arms in the great conflict of nationality and the union of the States under one free and always-to-be maintained Government.

In my long absence from the country I have had the most favorable opportunities for seeing and comparing in my own mind our institutions and those of all the European countries, and most of those of Asia, and comparing our resources and their development, and the capacity and energy of our people for upholding the Government and developing its resources, with most of the civilized peoples of the world everywhere, from England to Japan, and from Russia to Spain and Portugal. We are everywhere understood; our resources are highly appreciated, and the skill and energy and intelligence of the citizen recognized. My receptions have been your receptions. They have been everywhere a kind of an acknowledgement that the United States is a nation, a strong, independent and free nation, composed of strong, brave and intelligent people, capable of judging of their rights, and ready to maintain them at all hazards.

This is a non-partisan association, but composed of men who are united in the determination that no foe, domestic or foreign, shall interfere between us and the maintenance of our grand, free, and enlightened institutions and the unity of all the States. The area of our country, its fertility, and the energy and resources of our people, with the sparsity of population compared to area, postpone the day for generations to come when our descendants will have to consider the question how the soil is to support them and how the most can be produced for the support of human life, without reference to the taste or desire of the people, or when but a few can exercise the privilege of the plain luxury of selecting the articles of food they are to eat or the quality and quantity of clothing they are to wear, but will remain the abundant home of all who possess the energy and strength to make good use of them, if we only remain true to ourselves.

Such a country is one to be proud of. I am proud of it—proud that I am an American citizen. Every citizen, North and South, East and West, enjoys a common heritage, and should feel an honorable pride in it. I am glad these society meetings keep up their interest so long after the events and scenes which they commemorate have passed away. They do not serve to keep up sectional feeling or bitterness toward our late foe, but they do keep up the feeling that we are a nation, and that it must be preserved one and indivisible. We feel the kindest for those who fought and fought bravely on the opposite side from us. They equally claim with ourselves the blessings of our great common country. We claim for them the right to travel all over this broad land, to locate where they please, and the right to settle and become citizens and enjoy their political and religious convictions free from molestation or ostracism, either on account of this, or their connection with the past. We ask nothing more for ourselves, and we rejoice to see them become powerful rivals in the development of our great resources in the acquisition of all that should be desirable in this life, and in patriotism and love of country.

Other speech-making of a light nature was indulged by Gov. Oglesby, Gen. Sheridan and Gen. Schofield, after which the great humorist, Mark Twain, was called upon, and perpetrated the following:

Ladies and Gentlemen: I just within a moment heard Gen. Sherman say to a gentleman sitting in my neighborhood that, if he would promise not to speak more than two minutes, he would let him get up. He didn't say that to me, and I judge, by his remarks to me, that he wouldn't allow me quite so much. [Laughter, and a voice, "Louder."] But—is that loud enough [laughter]—I have not listened to a bad speech to-night, and I don't propose to be the one to furnish you with one; and I would, if I had time and permission, go on and make an excellent speech. [More laughter.] But I never was happy, never could make a good impromptu speech without several hours to prepare it. [Roars.]

On the following day, the ex-President was present at McVicker's Theater at the meeting of old soldiers from all armies, at which Gen. Chetlain presided.

Speeches were made by Corporal Brownell, the avenger of Ellsworth; Gen. Logan, Wm. Hendershott, Emory A. Storrs, Gen. Fuller, Gov. Oglesby, and Gen. Woodford. Gen. Grant spoke as follows:

Comrades and Friends of the Late War: I was entirely unaware of the object of my coming here this morning. I thought it was to see the place where you were to meet this evening or some other time. I was not aware that I was going to meet so many of my old comrades, but I assure you it affords me very great pleasure to meet you here, and to meet you everywhere. Veterans of the late war to me are companions, and in all my travels I have been in hardly a country, in hardly a town, and hardly a place in the two and a half years that I have been away from my own country that I have not met some of your number.

As we heard last night, wars, while not desirable, are not perhaps unattended with good. We believe sincerely that the war which we waged has been attended with solid good to our country. We believe that our victory redounded to the benefit of the vanquished as well as to ourselves. We believe that they would have been in a very much worse condition than they are now had their cause succeeded, and we certainly would have been infinitely worse off.

But wars render another benefit. People who grow up in a time of profound peace are very much accustomed to vegetate and live along in or near the place of their birth; but having been torn away from their homes, as all of you were, they got weaned from their homes, and at the close they seek the best place for the development of their energy and their talents, and in that way the veterans of our war are scattered over all of this broad land, and are now developing our Territories, building railroads, opening mines, opening farms, cultivating the soil over a vast territory which can be made, and is being made, available for the support of man. They have scattered, and are building homes in foreign lands, and opening in that way the commerce of our country; they are making our country felt, and known, and appreciated wherever a flag can float.

Now, gentlemen, I have said a great deal more than I had any idea I should say when I came here. And, as Mark Twain very aptly remarked last night, I could make a very much better extemporaneous speech if I had a couple of hours to prepare it in.

It is impossible to describe the enthusiasm with which all these speeches were received by the crowd of veterans that filled McVicker's spacious theater; but suffice it to say the roof was not lifted sufficiently to endanger the building, though there was some very loud cheering.

In the evening took place the banquet of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee, at the Palmer House. No finer sight was ever seen in Chicago than the banquet hall, with its decorations, and its long tables, occupied by near 700 gentlemen. At about 8 o'clock the exercises commenced with prayer by Prof. David Swing, after which the fine supper was partaken of, and toasts were given and responded to as follows: The first toast, "Our Country," was responded to by Gen Grant, as follows:

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee and Guests:

Notice was sent to me some days ago that I was to respond to a toast here, but I paid no attention to it at the time, and had no idea, until I got here, of the toast I was to reply to. I had relied upon it that there would be half a dozen or more speakers before I would be called upon and that, during that time, there would be a man out in the hall I would want to see, or thought I would exert some other flank movement by which I would get out of it. Finding, however, after my arrival here, that I was to be the first one called upon, and hardly feeling it would be proper to look for that man so early in the evening, I put in a substitute, but the President of your society has not called upon the man. I know if he had called the name on his paper you would have heard much more said about the position of our country among the nations of the earth than I can say to you. I can feel what the Mayor [Harrison] would probably have said if the President had called upon him. But, as I have to say a word, I shall rely now upon your signifying, in a very few moments, your disapprobation of what I am saying, so as to let me off. The President has given notice that we are not to speak any longer than we can hold the audience. Our nation we have been in the habit ourselves of looking upon as being one of the first nations of the earth.

For a long period back the Yankee has had not only a very respectable opinion of himself individually, but of his country as a whole. It has been our own opinion that we had nothing to fear in a contest with any other power. I am pleased to say that, from the observations that I have been able to make in the last two and a half years, we are beginning to be regarded a little by other powers as we in our vanity have heretofore regarded ourselves. We do, among other nations, I think, to-day, not only in our own conceit, but in the acknowledgment of other nations, occupy the position of one of the first powers in all that goes to make up a great nationality. We have the strength; we have the individual self-assertion, independence; and we have to a greater degree than almost any other nation the power of colonizing, of settling up new country, opening it and developing it. We have also the very great advantage of being without neighbors to molest and make us afraid. It is true we have a northern frontier, and we have a southern frontier, but we get along with a very small army. We keep no standing army. What little we do keep, as some one remarked the other day, is a standing army because it has no time to sit down.

Mr. President [who was seated], I find you filling the position with a good deal of ability. [Laughter.] I don't know of anything I can specially add to what I have said, except in the way of advice; and that is, let us be true to ourselves; avoid all bitterness and ill-feeling either on the part of sections or parties toward each other; avoid quarreling among ourselves, and we need have no fears for the future of maintaining the stand that we have taken among nations, so far as opposition from foreign nations goes. Gentlemen, I am much obliged for your attention.

Gen. Logan responded to the toast "The President and Congress;" Gen. Hurlbut to "The Army of the Tennessee;" Col. Vilas to "Our First Commander;" Admiral Stevens to "The Navy;" Hon. Leonard Swett to "The Mexican War;" Gen. Wilson to "The Army of the Cumberland;" Gen. Pope to "All Other Union Armies;" Robert G. Ingersoll to "The Volunteer Soldiers;" Emory A. Storrs to "The Patriotic People;" Gen. Fletcher to "Woman;" "Mark Twain" to "The Babies;" Gen. Woodford to the "Army of the Potomac;" and Gen. Schofield to "The Army." After the regular toasts a large number of regrets were read from prominent men in all parts of the country who had been invited to be present. A very enjoyable occasion it proved to be to the large number of old soldiers present, while the speeches were models of after-dinner rhetoric—short, sharp and eloquent.

BURNED TO DEATH.

By the Burning of a Candy Factory at Kansas City, About Twenty Boys and Girls Are Roasted.

Shortly after 1 o'clock p. m., on the 7th inst., the roof and walls of Corles' cracker and candy factory, Nos. 202 to 208 Main street, Kansas City, fell in with a tremendous crash, and in a few seconds flames sprung from the mass of debris. An alarm was at once turned in, summoning the fire department to the scene. In the building about 60 persons were employed, mainly young girls and boys. As the news of the disaster spread great excitement prevailed. Fathers, mothers, brothers and sisters of those at work in the factory rushed to the scene of the calamity, and soon a packed mass of human beings filled the streets and sidewalks in the vicinity of the factory. The city was wild with excitement, and thousands from the adjoining bluffs watched the blazing building. From the huge wreck issued screams, shrieks, and the crash of falling timbers and masses of brick. The furnaces were in full blast at the time of the accident, and the building was dry as tinder. A dense black smoke, through which the flames shot up, canopied the scene. The fire department was promptly on hand, and, with citizens, worked like heroes, but for a long time were powerless to arrest the flames. The fire was finally subdued, and then followed the search for the dead and wounded. The bodies of the following were taken out, one after another, from the smoldering ruins, all of whom had been either burned or crushed to death: Annie Becker, John Shuttys, Emma Kemper, Mary Goepper, Eddie McConnell, Louise Hummell, and ten boys, names at present unknown.

The walls crumbled and the roof fell in because of the overloading of the building with machinery and stock. Tons of machinery were in the building, which was a very old and weak one. The scene at the terrible catastrophe when the news had spread over the city was heart-rending in the extreme. Mothers, fathers, sisters, and brothers were there in terrible suspense over the fate of some loved ones. Anxious and tearful inquiries were made of those who escaped from the building, but in the excitement of the moment no definite information could be learned, and all the poor distracted relations could do was to hope against hope. The news of the horrible disaster when fully known settled over the city like a pall.

The number lost will finally prove about twenty, probably, as the smallest number that could have been in the building is stated at seventy-one, and there probably were ninety at the works.

Mr. Corles' loss on stock, machinery, and building is some $60,000; insured for $15,000. He is half crazy at the thought of the horrible loss of life that attended the disaster. A number of heroic incidents are told of the scenes at the fearful scene, among which may be noted the following:

When the flames were first seen issuing from the confused mass of bricks, machinery and goods, Andy Scanlon, formerly foreman on No. 3, was on the opposite side of the street, and almost in front of the fallen building. His first thought upon seeing the spiteful flames was of the rescue of those in the burning mass. He knew that a large number of children and girls were employed in the establishment, and in the confusion that would necessarily ensue many lives would be needlessly lost if prompt measures were not taken to assist them. Accordingly he rushed into the building and brought forth three persons in rapid succession, and returned for another, and, grasping the body of a boy named Andy McConnell, attempted to extricate him from the prostrate timbers that encaged him. His efforts were unavailing, no one being on hand to cut away the cruel fetters that held the boy as in a vise. Scanlon was compelled to forego his exertions and leave the boy to his fate.

It was discovered almost immediately after the dreadful crash that a young lady was lying near the front of the building, head downward and feet exposed. Her piteous calls for assistance and terrible shrieks of agony brought tears to the eyes of strong firemen, and with a bravery sublime they fought fire and flame and smoke, daring the danger of falling walls, to rescue the crushed victim. The fire enveloped the brave men, and, begrimed with smoke and ashes, they were driven back but to return. Through the doors of the building, amid the burning and broken bearers, could be seen the daring men tearing off the splintered timbers from where the poor girl was imprisoned. The firemen were too eager, and, turning the nozzle direct upon the rescuers, came near drowning them. Blinded by the water and nearly stifled by smoke, these men still struggled on. A shout of horror went up from the crowd as the toppling wall suddenly pitched forward and appeared to carry down into the ruins the brave men who were so boldly striving to rescue a fellow-being from a horrible fate. For a moment the heart of every person was in his mouth, and a death-like stillness reigned supreme. The wind veered a little and carried away the clouds of smoke, showing that death had spared the rescuers. There they stood, undaunted, resolute, determined to save the girl. Her voice had been hushed, and she was supposed dead. After a daring and brilliant attempt to loosen her from the crushing timbers, which was like facing hell itself, they were successful, and amid the rejoicings of the crowd Nettie Curtis was borne away.

—Later accounts represent the horror as not so destructive of life as at first reported, the dead numbering six, and the severely wounded seven. The evidence at the Coroner's inquest went to show that the accident was caused by an explosion of starch-dust in the factory.

HORRORS OF THE DEEP.

Two Collisions and a Few Minor Disasters Upon the Atlantic.

An ocean disaster of a horrible character took place off the capes of Delaware, on the night of the 7th inst., by which thirty-two of the fifty-seven persons aboard the steamship Champion went down into a watery grave. The ship Lady Octavia struck the Champion square amidships at 4 o'clock on the morning in question, and she sank in five minutes. The ship was badly damaged, but kept afloat. The Champion was on her trip from New York for Charleston, S. C. Three women and several children were among the lost, only one female—the stewardess—being saved from the steamer. Immediately after the collision, a boat was sent out from the ship, which in two trips picked up twenty-two of the crew and passengers of the wrecked vessel. A passing sailing vessel saved six, two passengers and four of the crew. The collision would seem to have been caused by carelessness, but on whose part is not at present certain.

On the night of the 9th inst., the steamer Falcon, from Baltimore for Charleston, collided with the schooner S. C. Tyron, from Kennebec river to Baltimore, loaded with lumber. As soon as the vessels drifted apart after the collision, the steamer was headed for shoal water, and she went down before proceeding half a mile. All the passengers and crew were saved, the steamer having reached water shallow enough to allow the rigging to stand above water, where they took refuge and were taken off in boats.

The Guyon line steamer Arizona, from New York for Liverpool, struck an iceberg and stove in her bows, and was obliged to put back to St. John, N. F.

The schooner Petrel, a small whaling schooner, was dismasted by severe gales in the last days of October, and drifted about at the mercy of the waves until the 29th, when she capsized, and fifteen persons were lost, including the Captain. The six survivors clung to the wreck until the 3d of November, when they were saved by Austrian bark Bebus. The sufferings of the rescued sailors were terrible, and they could have held out but little longer. Only one American was aboard, all the rest being Portuguese.

The schooner Florence was lost in Cumberland straits. All on board were rescued, but after great suffering. The Florence was engaged in the Howgate Polar expedition, under command of Capt. Tyson.

Election Echoes.

Pennsylvania official returns from all the counties give Butler, Republican candidate for State Treasurer, a majority over all candidates of 58,675.

A Richmond (Va.) dispatch says the indications are that the Debt-payers have a small majority in both houses, but the vote is so close that the official count will be necessary to positively settle the contest.

In Maryland, Hamilton's majority for Governor is 21,740. The Legislature will stand: Senate—Democrats, 19; Republicans, 5; Independent Democrats, 2. The House of Delegates—Democrats, 66; Republicans, 10; Democratic majority on joint ballot, 60.

A St. Paul (Minn.) dispatch says: "The returns indicate that Gov. Pillsbury runs considerably behind his ticket. His majority will probably be about 10,000, but the rest of the Republican State ticket will average from 12,000 to 15,000 majority. The vote throughout the State was comparatively light."

The vote for County Treasurer in Wabash county, Ind., resulted in a tie between the Republican and Democratic candidates, and the two will draw lots to see who handles the money for the next two years.

The anti-Tammany men in New York city and the Robinson men throughout the State are severe in their denunciation of John Kelly, and declare that he will never again be permitted to take a seat in a national or State convention.

At the recent election in New York Waldo Hutchins, Democrat, was chosen to fill the vacancy which existed in the Westchester district, the only vacancy in the lower house of Congress, except that very recently occasioned by the death of Representative George W. Patterson. As a Republican will, of course, be elected in Patterson's place, the election of Hutchins is a Democratic gain, giving the Democrats a clear majority of three over the combined vote of the Republicans, Greenbackers, and Independents of every class.

Returns from Wisconsin indicate that the majority for Smith, Republican candidate for Governor, will be between 20,000 and 25,000.

In Massachusetts, the majority for Long, Republican candidate for Governor, over Butler, is about 18,000.

Army of the Tennessee.

At the annual meeting of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee, in Chicago, last week, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

President—Gen. W. T. Sherman.
Recording Secretary—Col. L. M. Dayton.
Corresponding Secretary—Gen. A. Hickenlooper.
Treasurer—Gen. M. F. Force.
Vice President—Gen. J. S. Reynolds, Illinois; Gen. Ben Spooner, Indiana; Col. Frank Lynch, Ohio; Capt. W. E. Ware, Missouri; Capt. C. C. Chadwick, Michigan; Maj. M. A. Higley, Iowa; Gen. L. F. Hubbard, Minnesota; Col. George E. Bryant, Wisconsin; Col. W. J. Landrum, Kentucky; Gen. Amasa Cobb, Nebraska; Capt. J. B. Raymond, Dakota; Gen. M. M. Bane, Utah.

It was decided to hold the next meeting in Cincinnati.

Chief Ouray's house is furnished with Brussels carpet, window curtains, stoves, good beds, camp-stools, mirrors and an elegantly-carved bureau.

AUBURN COURIER.

[illegible]

It is reported that English capitalists have purchased [illegible] acres of land from the Kansas Pacific and Denver Pacific Companies, in the vicinity of Denver, through which they propose constructing a large canal, for the purpose of making this land available for agriculture by irrigation.

It is expected that the Governor of Florida will call an extra session of the Legislature to submit the proposition of the Florida ship canal. Gov. Drew has required a deposit of $15,000 to cover the expenses of the extra session, and the canal men have agreed to comply with the conditions.

The [illegible] of English miners to South Wales has been suddenly terminated by the discovery that the movement was the result of utterly false representations, by which large numbers of workmen have been cruelly duped. Those who went found themselves without employment, and are returning destitute to add to the stress of hard times.

Gen. Miles, the Indian fighter, has recovered $10,977 insurance in the St. Louis courts on his [illegible] baggage and that of nine of his officers, which was sunk in the Missouri river in May, when the steamer Cameron struck a snag. The objection of the insurance company was that the Cameron's pilot was not licensed, but the Judge held that as the pilot was in Government employment this was not necessary.

Preliminary negotiations are in progress for the completion of the St. Louis and San Francisco railroad from Viniti, in the Indian Territory, its present terminus, to the Pacific ocean. It is stated that some $20,000,000 of German capital, at 5 per cent. interest, has been offered to aid in the construction of the proposed extension, which is to be built under the land grant originally given by Congress to the Atlantic and Pacific railway.

That no woman ever swallowed her tongue is a statement which the gentle reader would believe, even if that father of whoppers, the ancient Ananias, had made it. But here is a woman who has swallowed her nose. While gargling for a severe catarrhal affection the other day, Mrs. Anna Thomas, of Petersburg, Va., felt a bone slipping down her throat. Upon examination it was found that Mrs. Thomas had swallowed the bone of her nasal organ, the bone having in some way become detached.

According the report of the National Board of Health Bulletin Chicago is the healthiest city in the United States. The death rate per 1,000 inhabitants in the principal cities for one week was as follows:

Boston	15.8	Charleston	30.2
Providence	17.5	Savannah	47.9
New York	19.7	New Orleans	21.8
Brooklyn	16.6	Cincinnati	16.9
Philadelphia	18.2	Dayton	16
Pittsburgh	19.1	Milwaukee	13.9
Baltimore	17.9	Chicago	11.9
Washington	14.7

The greatest mortality reported was that of Sing Sing, N. Y., where it reached the enormous amount of 104.3.

There are now open 8,215 miles of railroad in British India. During the present year the very important Indus Valley line, connecting the port of Kurrachu, in Scinde, with the Punjaub railroad at Moultan, has been completed, and thus, with the exception of the crossing the Indus at Suk Kur, a continuous communication by railway via Lahore, Delhi, Agra and Benares, to Calcutta, about 2,120 miles, is established. The lines in Upper India proved of great service in the recent campaign.

Lord Truro, whose residence is at Falconhurst, on the summit of Shooter's hill, not far from London, has just afforded an example of funeral simplicity. A few days ago his wife died, and his Lordship having caused to be made a plain coffin, lightly constructed, so as not to arrest the process of natural decay, had it interred in a grave dug in the lawn which fronts the house, at a spot selected for the purpose by the deceased lady during her lifetime. The grave is about four feet deep, and a marble monument will mark its position.

The Swiss Government carries on a great coaching business, but at a serious loss. In 1876 it owned 1,393 conveyances, estimated at about $300,000, and the total net loss on this branch of the postal service was over $80,000. The number of passengers conveyed was 1,329,303, of whom 278,884 traveled on what are known as Alpine and tourist routes. A notion of the great increase in Swiss traveling of late years may be formed from the fact that the passengers forwarded by post in 1852 are given at 570,104, in which figures travelers by rail are not included. Great economies have resulted in diminished use by the department in the past two years, the falling off of Swiss travel notwithstanding. The depression in England tells heavily on Switzerland.

What Zulu discipline and rule was is clearly indicated by a story told by Cetywayo himself while on his way down to the place of embarkation. Pointing to a bush, which he designated by the name of the coward's bush, he informed his conductors that, in front of that bush, Chaka used to sit after a battle had been fought in order to hear accusations of cowardice against any of his soldiers. If a man was convicted on what seemed sufficient evidence, he was expected to stand still with his left arm high above his head, while an assegai was slowly and by degrees thrust downward from the armpit till it pierced the heart.

Of all the crises through which the Turkish Government has passed the present is set down as the worst. England has made a formal demand of the Porte for the execution of the long-promised reforms in Asia and is disposed to insist on some action being taken in that direction. The rumor that the Sultan would be deposed on refusing longer to comply with the terms of the Berlin treaty is denied, although England's course amounts to the same thing. Its influence at Constantinople is powerful enough to effect almost any purpose it may have in view. The Ottoman Emperor is aware that his turbulent subjects will never permit the enforcement of the reforms provided for by the European congress. His position, insecure at best, would be vacated by death or flight forty-eight hours after he attempted to deprive the barbarians over whom he rules of their inalienable rights of brutality and degradation.

Severe Droughts.

An interesting record is that of severe droughts as far back as the landing of the Pilgrims. How many thousand times are observations made like the following: "Such a cold season!" "Such a hot season!" "Such dry weather!" or "Such wet weather!" "Such high winds or calms!" etc. All those who think that the dry spell we are experiencing at the present time is something remarkable will do well to read the following:

In the summer of 1621, 24 days in succession without rain.

In the summer of 1630, 41 days in succession without rain.

In the summer of 1657, 75 days in succession without rain.

He Hadn't Eaten Much.

It was Sunday afternoon, and young Mr. Staylaight had stopped until they were forced to ask him to take supper. The best china and the extra silver graced the table, and one of the best napkins was placed before young Mr. Staylaight's plate, for the family desired to create all the impression possible upon the susceptible mind. His young lady was conducting herself with great credit, and the young man was more than ever in love with her, when the mother said, passing the cake for the second time:

"Won't you have another piece, Mr. Staylaight?"

"No, thank you," said the young man, in his politest tone, "not any more."

"Oh, do have just one more," urged the mother, smiling sweetly; "you haven't eaten hardly anything."

The younger brother, who sat opposite, and had been instructed not to ask twice for anything, much to his disgust, saw his opportunity, and snorted out with great malevolence:

"Huh! I shouldn't think he had! He's eaten four hunks of tongue, three biscuit, two plates of sauce, two of them tarts, and both kinds of cake—and, mother, sis keeps kickin' me under the table. Make her stop."

They brought Mr. Staylaight to by dashing ice-water in his face.

"Oh, he'd lose anything," old Mr. Meredith, of West hill, growled, when the boy came back from an errand and said he'd lost the package intrusted to him; "he'd lose anything. One day last week I sent him to take a pickle barrel to a customer, and before he got the barrel to the house, I hope to die if he didn't lose the bung-hole clear out of it, and I had to send for a cooper to put in a new one."—Burdette.

FARM NOTES.

Farmers who are in debt should try their best this year to get out of it.

As a rule, superphosphate for wheat has proven the best special fertilizer.

A cellar that is cool, dry and dark, and yet well ventilated, is the best place for preserving potatoes in large quantities. When smaller quantities are to be preserved there is nothing like dry sand. The same may be said of fruits and roots of all sorts.

Cellars in which roots are stored should be kept cool, or the roots will shrivel and lose their freshness. Roots keep fresher in pits, or when covered with earth in the cellar. The supply for present use may be kept in barrels or boxes of sand in the house cellar, and replenished from the pits as needed.

Potatoes.—There is probably no potato that is a better keeper than Snowflake. Two sound eyes to a hill are sufficient. As many potatoes can be raised therefrom as if whole potatoes are used. The best potatoes, grown under favorable circumstances, contain 20 per cent. of starch; poor ones, about 10 per cent.—Rural New Yorker.

Storing Onions.—A dry, cold, airy loft is the best for storing onions. Do not let them lie more than two or three bulbs thick, and often look them over and pull out bad ones. Do not remove any of the outer rind but what comes off in the handling. They also keep well in ropes and hung up, the easiest way to make them, which is to tie them on a hay or straw band, which is better than a stake. This plan is useful where shelf-room is scarce; but the points to observe are a cool, airy situation, warmth and moisture being more inimical to their keeping than frost.

Raising Radishes.—A correspondent in reply to the question, how table radishes can be successfully raised in the garden, says: "I find no difficulty in raising nice crisp ones in my garden, and having them in rotation during the entire season. What the radish needs is a fertile, sandy soil, that does not bake on the surface. The soil of my garden fills this bill. Moisture, the sun and quick growth do the rest. I undertook to improve one of my radish-beds by filling it with heavy black loam obtained from the river bottom. It was a failure. One or two of my friends were not successful in raising radishes until they formed beds of sand wheeled from the road. In heavy or clayey soils radishes are apt to be tough, pungent and wormey, unless the ground is kept well pulverized, and the weather is favorable to a rapid growth. I think the quality of soil alluded to, a rich sandy loam that will not bake on the surface, will generally produce nice crisp radishes. If it should lose its virtue by planting the same crop for a number of years, change to another location."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A. Crawford, of Lapeer county, Mich., has been experimenting with potatoes, and sends the result to the Rural New Yorker: In order to test the relative cropping qualities of the few varieties of potatoes I cultivated out of the multitude introduced to the public within the last few years, on the 5th of May I planted eight hills of each of the following kinds. The soil was a sandy clay loam—a clover sod. No manure was used. The tubers were cut in single eyes, and one eye planted in a hill. The care given all was the same in every particular. At digging time I selected four hills of each variety, with the following results when the respective yields were weighed:

Dunmore Seedling	13 pounds.
Genesee Co. King	21 „
Compton's Surprise	19 „
Early Rose	11 „
Late Rose	22 „
Tompkins' Surprise	10 „
Calico	9 „

Owing to drought during the past summer the yields were not large; but the figures show the relative productiveness of the various sorts. I also made the following tests with and without fertilizers: I planted eight hills of the same varieties under each condition, and out of these I selected and weighed the product of four. These weighed: Without fertilizer, 9 pounds; with a table-spoonful of salt sprinkled at the roots of the vines, after hilling up, 12 pounds; with a compost of one part of salt to five of unleached wood-ashes, 14 pounds; with one part of salt, five of unleached wood-ashes and three of decomposed hen-manure, a handful of the mixture having been placed at the roots after hilling up, 22 pounds. I also used leaf-mold with splendid results. Concerning the cutting of seed, I made the following trial in ten hills of the same varieties under each of the named conditions: First, I planted whole medium-sized tubers, one to a hill; second, medium-sized tubers cut into four parts, one piece to a hill; third, I cut to a single eye and planted one piece to a hill; fourth, I cut one eye into four parts and planted one of these small sets to a hill. The result of each lot of ten hills was: Whole tubers, 20 pounds; quarter tubers, 27 pounds; single eyes, 38 pounds; one eye divided into four parts, 21 pounds.

Is Disease a Friend to Life?

At the last anniversary meeting of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, Dr. A. F. A. King read to a crowded audience an essay entitled "The Conservative Influence of Disease on Producing Longevity."

With much force of argument and analysis, he labored to prove that disease was not the terrible enemy to mankind that it had been painted by the terrors of humanity, but in reality was a true and beneficent friend. He quoted from the celebrated Dr. Austin Flint that "the existence of disease, rightly considered, was an inestimable boon."

He said that the disease was not in itself better than health, but that it contributed to promote longevity relatively to circumstances. He cited morbific conditions known as gastritis, rheumatism, hemorrhage, mumps, and insisted, with an earnestness that commanded attention, and a subtlety of logic that inspired respect for his originality of thought, that these diseases prevented sudden death.

In gastritis, the patient naturally refrained from eating, and demanded copious draughts of cold water, treatment which the most skillful surgeon found to be the best. In rheumatism, the acute pain demanded rest, and rest was found to be just the thing needed, for the articular symptom proved that heart-disease was the real enemy, and muscular exertion was the most fatal thing for affection of the heart. So with other diseases.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

French Mustard.—Slice an onion into a bowl and cover with good vinegar; add to it a teaspoonful of cayenne pepper, a teaspoonful of salt, a teaspoonful sugar, one egg, and mustard enough to thicken; set on the stove and stir till it boils; when cold it is fit for use.

Warm Slaw.—Slice a head of cabbage fine; put it in a stew pan, with a little water, and scald well; sprinkle salt, pepper, and sugar over it; then take two-thirds of a teacup of vinegar, one-third of a teacup of water, one egg, one-half teaspoonful of flour, well mixed together; pour it over the cabbage and let it come to a boil, when it is ready for the table.

To Color a Faded Hair Switch Dark Brown.—Of black tea take a small handful, boil the strength out, and strain; put in a very small piece of copperas, and dip in and hang out to dry; wash in clean soap suds; do not put in too much copperas, as it will rot the hair; just enough to set the color. If not dark enough dip in again; let it stay in a few minutes.

Harmless Cosmetic.—Here is a recipe for a perfectly harmless cosmetic: Four ounces of alcohol, one ounce gum benzoin; mix, bottle and shake well; let it stand in a warm place three days, shaking occasionally; strain, and to one pint rain water put a teaspoonful of mixture. Using this in the water you wash in will render the skin smooth and white. Try it; it is perfectly harmless.

Antidote to Poison.—If a person swallows any poison whatever, or has fallen into convulsions from having overloaded the stomach, an instantaneous remedy, most efficient and applicable in a large number of cases, is a heaping teaspoonful of common salt, and as much ground mustard, stirred rapidly in a teacupful of water, warm or cold, and swallowed instantly. It is scarcely down before it begins to come up, bringing with it the remaining contents of the stomach; and lest there be any remnant of the poison, however small, let the white of an egg or a teaspoonful of strong coffee be swallowed as soon as the stomach is quiet, because these very common articles nullify a large number of virulent poisons.

Lamp-Mat.—Perhaps some of the lady readers would like to learn how to make a nice lamp-mat for the center-table: First make a frame just one foot square, then put pegs one inch apart, then wind Berlin wool around, one color at time. It will take of each color thirteen knots. After it is all wound, take thread the same color as the top yarn, and bring from the under side to the top, then cross and just put it the other way, and tie on the under side. It can be cut so as to leave a square in the center, or cut so as to leave a three-cornered piece in each corner. Leave three threads to hold it together; then steam it well, and you will have something very pretty. Scarlet and French white will be the prettiest, but there are some colors that are more durable, such as garnet, and a green that will match well.

Great Warriors Never Work.

Piah, one of the chiefs supposed to be engaged in the present outbreak, has been to Washington. One cold day Gov. McCook came into his office and found Piah hugging a stove. Thinking it a good chance to deliver a lesson to the Indian, he said: "Piah, why don't you Indians plow, and raise crops, and build houses? You ought to work. If you did, you would not have to come here to borrow my fire, but could buy fire of your own. Why don't you work like white men?"

Piah straightened up at once and proceeded to make a speech. "Me great warrior," said he. "Warriors no plow. Me go to Washington and see John Grant." [The Indians all call Grant "John."] "John Grant great warrior. He no work. He no plow. Me see John Grant's squaw. She no work, either, too. Great warriors never work. Tell you what do. You say to John Grant he come here and go with me. We go out and fight 'Rapahoes and Cheyennes, and kill plenty braves, and get plenty squaws. Then squaws work, and me and John Grant have bully good time. No work—no plow—no nothing."

Whether the proposition was ever forwarded to Grant, we do not know.—Denver Tribune.

Died at the Age of 112.

Mrs. Mary Donahue died in New York, not long ago, aged 112. She was born in Londonderry, Ireland, in 1767. She married a young farmer named Donahue and came to America, arriving here in 1847, two years after her husband's death. She had ten children—three boys and seven girls—all of whom are still living. Up to the last hour of Mrs. Donahue's life she was in full possession of all her faculties, and had walked around the house on the day she died. Her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Jane Donahue, with whom she has lived for the past twenty-two years, says that the old lady had a notion that she was possessed of at least $2,000. For several months she was accustomed to look around for the treasure, but never found it. She had thirty-two grandchildren and three great-grandchildren, one of whom is serving in the United States army. After she had passed her 100th year she began to grow childish, and frequently would send for her children and grandchildren only to tell them of her girlhood and the many trials that she went through during the trying times of '98. The last wish of the old lady was that she should be buried at home, but this was impossible, as her children had not sufficient money to defray the expenses.

REST AS MEDICINE.

Some Useful Hints to the Tired and Overworked.

(By a Family Physician.)

Every intelligent medical man of the present day recognizes the very great value of rest in the treatment of disease. It is not my intention, however, in this paper to enter minutely into the physiology of this great natural restorer, but, as in former articles I have endeavored to impress upon my readers the benefits to be derived from judicious exercise, so in this I mean to teach, if I can, in a plain way, the advantages derivable from rest—and if they only manage to carry away with them a few hints, they shall not have read this article in vain. Rest and activity might be aptly compared to two sentinels, who have between them the duty of guarding a camp or fortress. They must take it in turns—when the one goes off, the other goes on. Were activity to remain too long on duty, the heart would flutter and fail, the brain would reel, and the sentinel drop dead of fatigue. On the other hand, rest might remain long enough on guard to drop asleep. You see that even rest may be overdone; it conduces to sloth, and ennui, and atony of the brain. To my thinking, there is no more miserable man than he who has nothing to do. Were I deprived of my pen, and deprived of the power of doing otherwise the little good I do; if there were no more work for me in this world, then, methinks, I should indeed be an unhappy man. On the other hand, put me in prison, and though you feed me but sparingly, give me foolscap, ink and quills, and a daily run in the court-yard, and I think I should manage to rub along.

Many people suffer from chronic indigestion, from the mere fact that having first and foremost produced the dyspepsia by overloading the stomach, or by other excesses in diet, they give it no rest; they keep on worrying it to get well; the very medicines they pour into it keep up the irritation in probably five cases out of ten. In these cases I am convinced that two or three hours' complete rest to the stomach every day from both meat and medicine would soon induce a healthy hunger. Those who have this organ in good working order would do well to remember that the time when every particle of food has left the stomach is not the time to put more in. An hour's rest, at least, is needed, and if you give it this before each meal it will be a very willing servant, and will never think of suggesting the propriety of a sherry and bitters before you sit down to dinner; and remember a willing servant makes a glad master, and a good-tempered one to boot.

The kidneys are extremely hard-working, and, as a rule, healthy organs, but are often out of order when we little wot of it. They are long-suffering organs, and are not like the stomach or liver; they do not call out when first hurt. But they, too, need their periods of rest, and undue stimulation is sometimes productive of the most dire and fatal results. Beer and alcohol might be called direct stimulants to the kidney; abstinence from them in persons who have been used to them will often give this organ rest and time to get over ailments trifling in themselves, but which if not cured might lead slowly onward to death. "Oh, but I must have my beer," I heard Mr. C—— say, last summer—he was suffering from a very slight attack of diabetes. He had his beer and never recovered.

The liver is another organ which often has to complain for want of rest. It is greatly over-stimulated by overloading the stomach with more food than can be easily digested, by irregularity in diet, but above all by the abuse of fermented drinks. These alone are capable of producing illnesses which, if not immediately fatal, make life a burden, a weary chain that the patient has to drag out. Like every other organ of the body, the liver must have rest, and you can give it that rest by cultivating habits of abstemiousness and temperance; rest, but rest with periods of activity regularly intervening. Some people have naturally sluggish livers, must take medicine occasionally, such as a blue pill at night and seidlitz in the morning; but for those whose livers are ordinarily pretty active there is no fillip to the liver equal to a good brisk walk—not a mere saunter along, but a walk that shall quicken the breathing and cause the diaphragm to gently compress the organ between it and the abdominal viscera.

A liver that does not get regular rest gets in time changed in structure, to the great detriment of the health of its owner; it is also rendered more liable to diseases of a more active and fatal kind, for the simple reason that it is a weakened organ.

The same may be said about the heart. How many times and oft does the dissector's knife reveal changes of structure in this organ, which regular rest alternating with periods of activity during life might have prevented! Too much bodily work, too much athletic exercise, constant worry of mind, grief and care and sorrow, all these act detrimentally upon the heart, and shorten, if they do not speedily take, life. The cure is obvious; avoidance of the cause, if you can, and rest whenever possible. Unrequited love, or loss of the loved one from whatever cause, some will tell you never kills, but I could adduce more than one case to prove it may lead to death. A grief like this is hard to bear; there is but one cure—change of scene and work, the work being in this case actual rest for the strained heart.

The brain is frequently the hardest-worked organ in the body, and frequently, too, it is just the one to which rest is denied. Brain-workers form a very large portion of the community, if we include in the list, as I think we ought to, not only writers, students, and deep thinkers, but business men as well, men in city life, whose minds are on the rack from morning till night, and probably nearly every day all the year round. It is absurd for such as these to think they can keep on forever, without some regularly recurring periods of rest and relaxation; but some men do think so. They are mad on the point, or strangely obtuse!

Others, again, think they can keep on till they are just within a step or two of the inevitable break-up. They may, however, go a step farther than they intended, and either go out like the snuff of a candle, or walk this earth, till they die, with ruined constitutions. But there is another class of brain-workers who make a far more grave error—namely, those who use stimulants to increase their brain-power, and get still more work out of themselves. From the ranks of these men lunatic asylums are recruited.

Now, for a case of debility and illness with lowness of spirits, etc., and the loss of power of looking at everything in the brightest light, there is only one cure, and that is rest. But what kind of rest? Before you can get a brain-worker to give up thinking about the work that has made him ill, you must give him some other employment, and one that he will take an interest in. Every one must choose for himself what that shall be, whether shooting, fishing, or a walking or boating tour. A month of either of these will work wonders; that particular portion of the brain which has been overworked to weariness and weakness will take rest, and tissues will be repaired, and at the end of the holiday not only will mental vigor be restored, but the health of the body generally will be vastly improved.

There are cases in which, through the giving way to excesses of various kinds, including intemperance in eating and drinking, the sufferers feel what they often describe as "altogether out of sorts." There isn't, perhaps, an organ in the body that isn't crippled more or less, and the mind, too, seems to partake of a share of the general wreck. Mind you, there may be no real disease in any part of the frame, and still the patient feels as ill as possible. For cases like these I can prescribe nothing better than change of scene, and complete rest of body and mind. This, combined with temperance in eating and drinking, will soon repair the system. But, once restored to health, let a complete change in the system and style of living be had recourse to, or the second illness will be infinitely worse than the first.

Tonics of some kinds may be found of great use, in helping to restore relaxed constitutions during the holiday taken immediately before the advent of winter. The mineral acids with bitters, and the tincture of bark, will often be found invaluable; so will the bath. Here is a capital tonic in the form of a bath. Well lather the body throughout with soap and hot water, from head to foot, by means of a bathing-glove. Then immediately after take a cold sponge-bath, which should be ready at hand. If real sea-water is at hand so much the better; if not, the bath should be got ready the night before, by throwing into it two or three good handfuls of the rough sea-salt of the the shops. The bath should be taken the very first thing after getting out of bed, and if afterwards a short walk be taken before breakfast the sense of exhilaration will be very great.

The Philosophy of Blowing Out a Candle.

If we blow a fire it burns more fiercely, but if we blow a candle it goes out. These two facts taken together are a familiar illustration of the influence of temperature upon chemical affinity. In both cases, that of the fire and that of the candle, the burning is the combining of carbon and hydrogen with oxygen. Now cold carbon or hydrogen may lie in contact with oxygen for any length of time without combining with either, but if the substances are made red-hot they instantly enter into chemical combination. When a candle is burning, the heat generated by the combustion constantly raises new quantities of the material to the temperature at which combination with oxygen will take place, and thus the combustion is kept up. But if a current of air of a temperature far below the combustion point is thrown against the flame, the hot vapors are swept away, and others which are rising in their place are so cooled that combination with oxygen no longer continues; in other words, the candle ceases to burn.

On the other hand, when we blow a large fire, the mass of burning combustion is so great that, instead of the carbon and hydrogen being cooled, the oxygen is heated, and the combination is made more active; in other words, the fire burns more fiercely.

New York Ticket Speculators.

During steamboat navigation the best state-rooms are taken up by speculators. In winter the same class devotes itself to the theaters, in purchasing the best seats. When an extraordinary attraction occurs, half the house may be taken in advance, and those who wish to see the performance can do so by paying a premium. The managers say the case is hopeless; they cannot refuse the seats to any one who offers the price. The speculators show great tact. They make opera and star engagements their harvests, and $250 have been made in one night. The speculator knows the capacity of every theater, and the attractive power of every performer. This, with a capital of $200, enables him to make a handsome living. There is no remedy except for theater-goers to buy tickets early, but this is seldom done, and hence the speculator may be considered a permanent institution. Some of them have been years in the business, and find it easy to make a good living, as their profits average $100 a night through the season.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, NOV. 20, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY
EDITORS.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

"NO SOLID SOUTH, NO SOLID NORTH, BUT A SOLID UNION."

The Germans of the United States are strongly in favor of Bayard for president.

In the recent election in Pennsylvania, the greenbackers lost two-thirds of their last year's vote.

John Kelley's vote in New York was 77,471. It is evident that John Kelley must be consulted, if the democrats want to carry New York in 1880.

If Indiana is compelled to surrender to New York in the nomination of a democratic candidate for president, may the successful man be Hon. Horatio Seymour.

Fred. Douglas Jr., son of his father, (colored) gives it as his opinion that the negro exodus is "an attempt to stop up one hole by boring another," and Fred. ought to know.

Old rebel Bob Toombs is about to graduate with republican honors; his "Death to the Union" sentiments agree with modern republican ideas exactly. Toombs would make a good republican candidate for president.

Hon. Fernando C. Beaman, who was appointed by the governor of Michigan to fill the unexpired term of the late Senator Chandler, declined to accept on account of ill health, and the governor appointed ex-governor Henry P. Baldwin instead.

The democrats of Shelby county have organized a Hendricks club at Shelbyville, for the purpose of urging the nomination of Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks for president. If the democrats of every county in the state would do likewise, the national convention would hardly dare to disregard such an uprising of Indiana democrats.

Indiana has been divided into six supervisor's districts for taking the census of 1880. The counties of Adams, Allen, Blackford, DeKalb, Elkhart Grant, Huntington, Jay, Kosciusko, La-Grange, Noble, Steuben, Wabash, Wells and Whitley constitute the sixth district. The supervisor will be selected from among the applicants of this district, and must be appointed by January 1st.

With the democracy of New York united, there is not the least doubt of the result in that state in 1880. That New York is now, and has been for years, a democratic state, there is no question. The fears expressed by eastern democrats, prior to every national convention as to the result in New York, are mere pretensions, intended to influence the convention in favor of an eastern candidate. That New York can only be carried for the democrats by a New York man at the head of the national ticket is all bosh. Harmony in the party is the only requisite in New York; when that is accomplished her thirty-five electoral votes will be democratic. We believe that coming events will prove that Indiana will need more attention than New York in 1880. Indiana will be the battle-ground and her fighters must be well supported and greatly encouraged in order to achieve certain victory. The next democratic ticket must be headed by an Indiana man. We prefer Mr. Hendricks, but could heartily support either McDonald or English, and will abide by the decision of the convention.

Indiana and New York.

[State Sentinel.]

The recent elections conclusively show that if the democracy elects the next president it must have the votes of Indiana and New York. While neither of these states is absolutely certain to go democratic next year, the probabilities are that both will do so, if the proper nominations are made. Indiana is as neccessary to democratic success as is New York, and in choosing the candidate for 1880 this fact should be borne in mind.

Many democratic newspapers and public men outside of Indiana have, since the fall elections, been industriously engaged in fixing up slates and naming the men whom they assume can carry the pivotal states, but we submit that the democrats of these states are more competent to make the proper selections than are the democrats living elsewhere; therefore the party will act wisely if it mainly leaves the matter to those who are best qualified to determine it. In assuming this position we do not mean that Indiana and New York should meet and nominate the candidates for president and vice prisident, but we do mean that the national democracy should well consider the views and wishes of the democracy of these states, when it comes together to make the nominations.

Indiana has but one candidate to place before the next democratic national convention for president. Her democracy is not divided, either upon men or upon measures. It is a unit for Thomas A. Hendricks and for the principles of the democratic party. She has other distinguished men within her borders—men whom the democracy delight to honor—but for president of the United States she has but a single name to present. We hope our political friends elsewhere will believe us when we say that upon this subject our democracy is solid. We know the man who can make democratic success assured in Indiana, and that man we have named. It should be remembered that we had not a majority of the votes of Indiana in 1876, nor in 1878, and, therefore, that it will not be safe to count on Indiana in 1880, unless we have a candidate entirely acceptable to our people. Mr. Hendricks is the man our people want to lead them, and it will be an act both of policy and of wisdom to nominate him. With him as a candidate we can carry Indiana; without him the race at best would be a doubtful one.

We have nothing to say as to who would be the proper man for New York to select as Mr. Hendricks' associate; we are willing to leave this question to the democracy of that state, only hoping it will be someone who can unite the distracted democracy of the Empire state. If this be done, New York can be carried; if it be not done, all will be lost. Let us hope that a state which has produced a Wright and Marcy, and which now has within her border a Seymour, a Tilden, and a Potter, will not be found wanting when the hour comes to act, but will unite upon some man as the fit person to place on the ticket with Mr. Hendricks. Should this be done, we can not doubt that the choice of Indiana and of New York will be confirmed and ratified by the democracy of the country when it meets in national council, and afterward by the people at the polls. In such an event, we feel warranted in saying the successful candidates will be inaugurated president and vice president of the United States, for the tactics so successfully played in 1876 can not be repeated in 1880.

The Teachers' Institute.

We continue our account of the Teachers' Institute, at Garrett last week:

WEDNESDAY.

Called to order by the Supt.; reading and prayer by Rev. Miller; song by choir; general remarks by Supt.

Recitation in general drawing by Mr. A. M. Strong, of Newville; how to teach it in a common school; he was much praised for earnestness in the work.

History, by Supt, who conducted the class with a great deal of energy. The teachers seemed to manifest a double amount of interest in a recitation so well managed.

Geography by T. H. Shoub.

C. A. Fyke, B. F. Walter, Miss L. Daniels, Miss Mary Brundage and Frank Fisk were appointed as a committe on resolutions, to report on Friday evening, followed by choir. Recess Elocution by Miss L. Daniels, who made the recitation very entertaining and instructive, by a variety of exercises. Song by the choir, registering names, etc.

NOON.

Institute called to order by Supt.—Song by the choir. Next an essay by Miss A. Baxter, an excellent production, so much so that a request from the teachers to have it printed in the Garrett Herald was unanimous.

Physiology by C. M. Merica, with a class of well trained pupils. Some valuable remarks were made upon the subject by A. C. Shortridge, of Indianapolis, Cyrus Smith, of Jackson, Mich., and others. Mr Smith advised scholars to use their own language in reciting a lesson.

Recitation in Orthography by J. S. Otis. A recitation by Miss M. K. Zeigler good. Question box. Song by class. Adjourned. Registering names, etc.

EVENING SESSION.

Speches by A. C. Shortridge and Cyrus Smith. Recitations by Miss M. K. Zeigler. Song by the choir, led by Otis and Fyke.

Miscellaneous business. Reading of the resolutions, by Frank Fisk. Distribution of cards containing grade of attendance. Adjourned for one year.

RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God to permit so many of us to meet in the capacity of an Institute.

Resolved, That we humbly acknowledge our dependence upon Him, and willingly submit to His guidance in all our deliberations.

That we, as teachers of DeKalb county, most heartily express our thankfulness and gratitude to the people of Garrett for their very kind and generous hospitality toward us during our stay with them, and also to the Pastor and Trustees, for the use of the M. E. church.

That we extend to the Superintendent, Secretary, and all others who have assisted to make the Institute instructive and interesting, our sympathies and gratitude for their care and labor.

That we tender our most sincere thanks to the choir for the excellent music which they have furnished during the session, and especially to Mr. Otis and Miss Rowe for their tasteful selections, and for their earnestness in the work.

That we, as teachers of DeKalb county, shall conduct our schools in such a manner that we will enjoy, rather than dread, the visitation of schools by parents, trustees and the county superintendent.

That we express our most sincere appreciation for the accommodations granted us by the B. & O. R. R., in transporting us to and from the Institute.

That we are much in favor of a graded system in our country schools, that we also realize that without full cooperation of the parents and trustees, this system cannot be made a success.

That we, the teachers of DeKalb county, believe that justice should prevail, and that skilled labor is worth more than that which is not, therefore with due deference and respect to our trustees, we kindly ask them not to endorse the uniformity of wages, but to pay the teachers in proportion to the professional work.

That by the death of James McOscar and Joseph Hall, we have been deprived of two faithful co-laberers, and that we deeply lament their loss.

B. F. WALTER,
C. A. FYKE,
MARY M. BRUNDAGE,
LUCINDA DANIELS,
FRANK FISK.
} Committee on Resolutions.

55 teachers were present at the first roll call, and 146 teachers at the last.

Considering that the week was very gloomy and the place of meeting at one corner of the county, and it not being generally known that a special train was to meet the teachers at Auburn Junction, the attendance was good, and all seemed to take a deep interest in the work, and appreciate our Superintendent's exertions to make it a success.

—The presentation of Pinafore at Ft. Wayne, by home talent, drew a three-hundred-and-fifty-dollar house Monday night. The performance was excellent, and was repeated last evening.

—Everybody says that Easley & Co., have the nicest line of misses' ulsters and hoods ever brought into town, having made 10 or 12 orders since the first. Go there to buy them. 46-2t.

—The opening hop of the Neoteric club, given last Thursday night at Easley's hall, was a gay affair. A large crowd was in attendance and the receipts amounted to forty-one dollars.

—List of unclaimed letters remaining in the postoffice, at Auburn, Ind., Nov. 17, 1879:

J. Hansen, Marion Hiley, Bery McKenley, John Metcalf, Joseph Mathews, Jacob N. Olinger.

Jos. Rainier, P. M.

—The largest invoice of ruching, laces, lace ties, handkerchiefs, ladies' merino vests, notions, etc., ever brought to this place, at N. Easley & Co's, east side of public square. 46-2t.

—Any man who will deliberately blow his big nose at the table—to say nothing of using a napkin for the purpose—is an H. O. G. (horrible old galoot) and whoever the shoe fits can put it on.

—Messrs. Ryan and Allen, accompanied by two gentlemen whose names we did not learn, started Monday for a big hunt at Kawkawlin, (we have spelled it for you, and now you pronounce it) Michigan.

—Sam. Pommert's barber-shop has been transformed so that its old frequenters no longer recognize it; new awning, new paper on the walls, etc. And Geo. Helt, the new man, is a tip-top barber.

—B. J. Lowry, who held a "posish" in the Republican office not long since, was circulating amongst his friends in Auburn last Sunday. He now belongs to that numerous class of musicians called "drummers."

—Mrs. Katie Spangler, of St. Johns, (DeKalb P. O.) died last Friday, Nov. 14, of consumption, in her twenty-first year. The remains were conveyed to her old home in Pennsylvania, last Saturday, for interment.

—Miss Alice Clark is prepared to do all kinds of knitting. Ladies' and children's hose, gentlemen's half-hose, and mittens of all sizes made to order. Residence at the corner of Jackson and Eleventh streets, Auburn, Indiana. 47-2w.

—Now, Mr. Tice, please seek some secluded spot and soak your head. If there were any "meteors" running around loose on Thursday night last, we failed to see 'em, and there isn't a sober man in the country who spied any.

—Somebody at the junction owns a black-and-tan "purp" that is suffering either with St. Vitus' dance or the jim-jams. We don't mean to purp-etrate a libel on this eccentric canine, but we only refer to it as a dog-goned singular circumstance.

—Thanksgiving services will be held in the Lutheran church, on Jackson street, next Wednesday morning at 11 o'clock. Elder S. B. Ward will preach the sermon, and it is to hoped that all will turn out to render thanks to the Giver of all our blessings.

—Tom Ahern, the popular proprietor of the north side lunch room, Ft. Wayne, has gone and done it. That is, he pooled his chances for happiness last Tuesday morning, Nov. 18, with those of Mary Murphy, and the restaurant now has two bosses. We smoked.

—Members of the "Ladies Presbyterian Society," and all others interested in the thanksgiving dinner for the benefit of the church, are requested to meet at the Presbyterian church next Friday (to-morrow) evening at 7 o'clock, to make the necessary arrangements.

Mrs. S. W. Ralston, Pres.

—By a miscue of some kind, Charlie Emanuel got mixed up with a trio of blockheads yesterday in Hollister's, one of which was the writer, and he tried to make us believe that dates were dug up in 150-pound bunches, boxed ready for shipment, and marked "S. Hollister, Auburn, Ind."

—The new clock in the postoffice is surrounded by the following advertisements, which show who of our merchants are aware of the benefits of advertising: Schaab, Beugnot & Co., Jos. Abright, W. J. Austin & Co., C. H. Yesbera, F. E. Davenport, Jno. L. Davis and Frank A. Hoff.

—J. A. Smith, of Carey, Ohio, from 1870 to 1877 a resident of this place, has been stirring around amongst his old friends this week. Mr. Smith is now in business for himself at the above-named place, and he says things are flourishing. He likes the Courier, and showed his appreciation by leaving two dollars with us.

—Married:—At the residence of Mr. John Leas, on Nov. 18th, 1879, Mr. Jefferson Waterman and Miss Addie E. Leas, both of Waterloo, Ind.

—Married:—Last Sunday, Nov. 16, by Rev. W. L. Meese, Calvin H. Brown, of Concord township, and Alice Swineford of Wilmington, in the latter township and at the residence of the bride's father.

—The ladies of the Presbyterian church, as announced in last week's Courier, will serve a Thanksgiving dinner on that day and an oyster supper in the evening; and all the good things will be found at Cool's building, on Seventh street, next door to Kiblinger's.

—We dropped into the new Journal office at Fort Wayne, a few days since, and found the bosses, Mr. Foster, standing in front of a handful of type "throwing it in." Things looked rather crowded, as the press-room, sanctum and composing-room are combined; but everybody seemed busy, and that's what pays.

—Bro. Zimmerman, of the Valparaiso Messenger, has been slighting his exchanges for several weeks past, sending out folios instead of the regular quarto sheet; but then he gets in his new presses this week, steam fixin's and all, and we shall expect to see the Messenger cutting a big splurge hereafter. It ought to, at all events, for "Zim" will now have one of the neatest and best equipped country offices in the land.

—A. C. Katt, of the Ft. Wayne Sentinel, was in town Tuesday, getting up a club list for that enterprising daily. Heretofore we have not been able to get the Sentinel until afternoon of the day after publication, but from now out it will be delivered to subscribers in Auburn, by carriers, on the evening of publication; and we hope Mr. Katt's efforts to secure a good list will be successful.

—The action of Superintendent MacIntosh, in refusing to allow persons who are not qualified, to teach school in DeKalb county, will be indorsed by all lovers of education. The standard of qualification must be maintained, or the reputation of our schools will suffer. Qualified teachers are wanted in Stafford, Wilmington, Fairfield, Smithfield and Richland townships, fourteen vacancies in all. The superintendent will assist applicants in securing a situation.

—Doctor Collar, a former resident of Auburn, who will be remembered as the author of a slanderous article published against Doctor Casebeer, about two years ago, is now being prosecuted by the state of Indiana, before a justice of the peace in Kosciusko county. We have not learned the nature of the case, but there is a woman in it. Collar's attempt to ruin the reputation as a physician and the private character of Doctor Casebeer was a total failure, as the doctor stands higher in this county than ever, while Collar has won the contempt of many of our people.

—The neighbors of Jack Shutt, whose farm is located about ten miles southeast of here, have got the laugh on him now very extensively as it were. He probably neglected to study his almanac last week, and as a consequence dropped one day out of the calendar; anyhow, when the neighbors heard his dinner-bell ring last Sunday they rushed in from two miles around, thinking it was a signal of distress, but it was only to call Jack and the hands in, who were out in the fields husking corn! And now, if you are prepared to defend yourself, just ask him what day of the week Sunday comes on.

Teachers' Institute.

The recent assembly of teachers at Garrett is worthy of notice, for the deep interest and generous support shown by corporations and people. The action of the B. & O. railway company in sending a special to the junction twice daily, and on Friday afternoon conveying teachers along the road, dropping them by twos or small parties at places convenient to their homes, is a courtesy remarkable for its rarity and appreciated by friends of education for its manifestation of interest in a public service. Citizens of Garrett vied with each other in friendly offices to teachers. They made them comfortable in their homes, they showed them through the shops of the railroad, they attended sermons and lectures and won the hearty thanks of all.

School trustees had made every arrangement, church trustees then opened their new building free, and all Garrett teachers took active prominent parts in the exercises. The Institute was notable for excellent attendance, good order and unvarying interest in exercises. The instruction aimed at utility and no time was wasted in display or frivolous discussion. Messrs. Fyke, Otis, Merrica and Misses Zeigler, Daniels and others, won rapidly in favor by their instruction, and the ladies became popular from their life-like rendering of choice selections. Lectures and addresses were well received, notably the polished and eloquent address delivered by W. L. Penfield. The result must be progress in school. The board of education met with almost full attendance and arrangements actual and prospective were made, looking to progressive change in school work in this county.

Stringent Laws Regulating Ohio Life Insurance Companies.

Ohio life insurance companies can now only invest their funds in first mortgages upon real estate, worth double the amount loaned thereon, exclusive of buildings, in government bonds, and in loans upon their own policies not exceeding the reserve value thereof, and must possess a sufficient amount of resources, with the lower rate of four per cent. interest, to meet their obligations when they mature. The superintendent must annually examine every Ohio life insurance company, and see that they possess the necessary investment, and that they are legally made. The laws of Ohio also provide that after three annual payments have been paid upon a life policy, in case of death the company shall be stopped from defending itself by reason of any errors, omissions or misstatements in the application except as ot age or fraud, which in effect makes Ohio policies incontestable after three annual payments have been made. No other state is so strict in regard to the safety of its policy holders. The Union Central life insurance company of Cincinnati is the largest Ohio insurance company, and confines its loans to policy-holders and largely among farmers. It is an institution which is entirely trustworthy, and managed by men of high standing and large business experience. Mr. Thos. H. Sprott, of Auburn, Ind., represents this company.

Cupp's Corners.

Editors Courier:—Some time since you requested correspondents to send in items for your paper; as several came to my notice, I will make an attempt.

—The good hearted ladies of this neighborhood made a surprise party for Grand mother Swihart last Thursday, and it was a grand success. They carried with them baskets of provisions and had a sumptuous dinner, after which they made the old lady a nice little donation, which consisted of wearing apparel, canned fruit, knives and forks, shears, coffee, sugar, bed-ticking, cash, and many other articles too numerous to mention. The amount donated was over $15.00. Twenty-six for dinner. They left the old lady feeling very happy.

—The greatest surprise that we ever had in this neighborhood happened at George Clark's last Thursday. Maggie and George had it all to themselves, and were mighty sly about it too, but the boys found it out in time to give them a rousing good belling.

—Yesterday I had the pleasure of attending the golden wedding of David and Catherine Krider, living half a mile south of Auburn Junction, and if you will indulge me with space in your paper, I will try to give you the particulars. The old gentleman was born in Lebanon county, Penn., in 1799; Catherine Olinger, his wife, was born in Washington county, Maryland, in 1807. This aged couple were maried in Washington county, Md., in the year 1827, which was 52 years previous to their golden wedding (on Sunday). They lived in Maryland 18 years, after which they settled in Stark county, Ohio, and resided in that county 28 years; from there they moved to this county and have lived among us 16 years. They have but one child living, a daughter who lives at Huntington, this state. The day was a beautiful one for the occasion, the old log house was filled with ladies and the gentlemen had to use the yard for their sitting room; we did not care for that as the good ladies soon converted the door yard into a dining room, and we had an excellent wedding feast. After dinner we were furnished with excellent music by A. H. Powell The groom said, "Be careful of your music, or my feet will get loose, as old as I am." Then commenced the donations, as follows: Wm. Burns and wife, can of syrup and silver dollar; Lew. Spangler and wife, two sack of flour $3.50, sugar $1. coffee $1, crock of peach butter 75c.; Geo. Clark and wife, sack of potatoes 75c., 5 yard of calico 25c.; Mitch Houston and wife one gold dollar; Louis Olinger and wife, sack of corn and pickle dish; Jacob Raub and wife, 12 pounds of tobacco 80c., towels 80c.; David Olinger and wife, 1 gallon apple butter 50c., sack of flour $1.75, cash 25c.; Solomon Olinger and wife, sack of flour $1.75, dress 65c.; J. J. Martin and wife, purse 50c., gold dollar; Geo. Wernts and wife, quarter of beef; Wash. Teeters and wife, gold dollar and silver dollar; Pete Ditmar and wife, silver dollar and sugar $1; Eli Shull and wife, silver dollar and provisions $1.15. Wm. Grube and wife, cord stove wood and dress good $1; David Essig and wife, underclothing 40c.; David Krider, Jr. and wife, silver dollar; Jno. Feagler and wife, silver dollar and calico 25c.; Jeff Grube and wife, sack of flour $1.75, goods 50c.; Wm. Olinger, sack of corn; A. McEntaffer, 50c.; W. Link, 25c.; F. Stoops 25c.; A. Powell, 50c.; C. W. Wernts, 25c.; T. C. Elson and wife, pair of woolen mittens, two sacks of corn and a pig.

Twenty married couples, six young gentlemen, two young ladies, and eight children ate dinner. Amount of donation $41.75, which made the old couple feel very happy indeed. The wedding guests requested, before leaving, that this be published in a county paper, and by so doing you will confer a favor on many patrons. Rural.

The Drama.

The Standard Dramatic Company played to a small audience last evening, owing to the inclemency of the weather, but it was none the less appreciative. The principal play was "The Farmer's Daughter" followed by a farce entitled "My Turn Next," in both of which the characters were admirably rendered. Miss Evans is a star in the profession and ought to be greeted with a full house every night; while Miss Ross as "Peggy," in the after-piece, was immense. Messrs. Compston, Barbaret and Mason also had their share of applause from the well-pleased audience. We bespeak for them a large attendance to-night, at which time will be presented "Fanchon, the Cricket."

Coroner's Inquest.

I the undersigned, coroner of DeKalb county, in the state of Indiana, on the 10th day of November, 1879, at Wilmington township, in said county and legally authorized to inquire and true presentment make, in what manner and by whom America Ann Sewell, whose body was found at the railroad yard of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad company at Butler, in said township and county, on the 10th day of November, 1879, came to her death. After having heard the evidence and examined the body, do find that the deceased came to her death by being run over with the tender attached to engine number one hundred and three, belonging to said railroad company, and while the deceased was the passenger of, and in the care of the servants of the Eel-river branch of the Wabash railway company, on her way from Auburn Junction to Butler in said county. And I do further find that said tender passing over the deceased and causing her death, was caused by the carelessness of George Norton, conductor of the said Wabash railway company's train carrying the deceased from Auburn Junction to Butler, in that he did not carry the deceased to the company's platform for passengers at Butler, upon said, train and did not exercise ordinary care in assisting the deceased to said platform after the train had stopped; and also by the carelessness of Ira E. Merritt, engineer in charge of said engine and tender, number one hundred and three, belonging to said Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad company, in that he failed to give the proper signals, by ringing of the bell and placing a proper light upon the back end of said tender while switching and backing upon said company's yard at the time said tender backed and ran over the body of the deceased.

Given under my hand, at the time and place of said inquisition, above mentioned. J. J. Latson,
Coroner of DeKalb county.

A THANKSGIVING PARTY.

Banks and his wife consulted
One bright November day,
Planning a splendid dinner
In a pleasant, airy way.
"We'll have a grand Thanksgiving!"
Said Banks, "and Polly, dear,
You get the guests together,
And I'll provide the cheer."

Then Banks, with [illegible]
Said, "Now's the time, my dear,
To ask one's wife's relations,
So let them all be here.
Yes, ask them all, my darling;
Your husband's not the man
To stop half-way in making
A pleasant family plan."

So Polly asked her people—
And they were not a few—
Papa, mamma and brothers,
And all her sisters, too;
These brought their little children
A laughing, romping crowd—
And, in their after-dinner speech,
Banks really felt quite "proud."

Yet, through it all, a shadow
Into his bosom stole;
He knew that bills were coming in;
They paralyzed his soul!
He knew that Mother Pippling
Was whispering good advice
In Polly's ear, and, somehow,
That wasn't very nice.

He knew the romping children
Had done him damage dire
(For Banks had dainty furniture
As any could desire);
But still the guests were merry,
The dinner went off well,
In spite of many vexing things
Which one don't care to tell.

And when, at last, 'twas over,
And every guest gone home,
The turmoiled house quite still again,
And resting-time was come,
Sweet Mrs. Banks said, cheerily,
"My dear, how kind of them
To come to us! Though mother—"
(Banks softly cough'd "Ahem!")

"Yes, mother noticed, bless her!—
One slight omission, dear:
She said Thanksgiving dinners
Without one 'thanks' were queer;
I know you don't say grace, dear;
But don't it seem to you
That to give thanks at such a time
Is what one ought to do?"

He fell into a reverie:
"You're right!" he sighed at last;
"Thank Heaven the thing is over;
The guests gone, and all is past!"
And so, in simple language,
By that good husband Banks
The grand Thanksgiving dinner
Was crowned by hearty thanks.

JACK'S THANKSGIVING STORY.

"Cousin Jack! Cousin Jack!" screamed a whole crowd of children on Thanksgiving afternoon, chasing Cousin Jack to the library door, which he impolitely slammed in their faces and locked inside.

"Oh, Cousin Jack!" yelled Charlie, into the keyhole, "you used to play with us and tell us nice stories, and now you run away."

"Do tell us a story," said pretty Miss Maud.

"Tell us a story," echoed little Christine and big Tom and lisping Flossy, the curly-headed blonde; and even baby Tot, who could hardly walk, and had a limited vocabulary, cooed, "Tell uth a 'tory."

"Run away, you young torments, every one of you!" roared Jack through the door.

"He's just horrid," was the unanimous verdict of the children. "It's stupid at grandpapa's to-day, and no Cousin Jack to play with us," pouted Tom.

"He didn't notice me one bit at dinner," said dignified Maud.

"An' he didn't pull my curls," lisped Flossy.

"No," said Christine; "he looked at that grown-up young lady, Miss Belle Carrington, and just talked and talked to her all the whole time."

"Say," whispered Charlie, "come out into the garden, and I bet we'll have some fun." So for the garden they all scampered.

Jack, after locking the door, was not master of the new situation inside, after all, for he looked very confused when a tall young lady standing by the mantel raised her eyebrows at him in surprise.

"I—I locked those urchins out, Miss Carrington," he stammered.

"Not for my sake," answered Belle. "I love children."

"The—the fact is, I saw you here, and I thought you'd like—at least I thought I'd like a talk all alone. I'm so glad Cousin Nell persuaded you to join our family party to-day." Jack went on, nervously jerking out his sentences, and then adding, in a tone of deep significance, "I hope this is not the last time you are to be one of us."

"Well, probably not," laughed Belle. "I may live, and Nell may invite me again."

"I don't mean that."

"Oh, then you don't want me to live, or don't want Nell to ask me again. Thank you."

"I don't mean that, either."

"What a meaningless young man you are!"

"I am a stupid fellow, I suppose."

"You know best," assented Belle.

"No; if I believed you thought me stupid, or tiresome, or unlovable, I'd give up my life, I'd go off somewhere—anywhere—to China, perhaps."

"You needn't go," she said, softly, looking down.

"Oh, Belle, dear Belle!" and Jack sprung toward her the length of the hearth-rug.

She stepped back sharply. "You needn't go—so far, I was about to say. Do let me finish a sentence. Go West—that's far enough."

Jack stared for a long minute at the pretty aggravating head held saucily on one side; then he deliberately stepped close up to Miss Belle Carrington and said a little phrase of three words. There flew to her cheeks a color which rivaled and avenged the many crimsons that her inscrutable ways had brought into poor Jack's complexion. The tables had turned. He was in earnest, and not to be laughed at or delayed. "Belle"—and he spoke very gravely—"I know you for a provoking flirt; but say you love me, and I'll believe you and believe in you."

"Do let me go," she answered, trying to look frightened and surprised.

"I'm not detaining you," he blundered out in masculine sincerity. She gave the pitiful glance of a bound captive, but never moved an inch.

"You are lovely as a dream," he murmured, watching her changing face.

"Let me go," she pleaded again.

"And dreams go by contraries," he exclaimed, a light breaking in upon him. "I won't let you go, Belle," and Jack boldly threw an arm about her waist.

"Oh dear," she complained, "what am I to say? You're very rude."

"Say, 'I love you, Jack.'"

She looked as if about to speak; he stooped to catch the words. She turned archly aside; but, happening to turn toward the window, shrieked out a startling "Oh!" and broke away with a violence that nearly sent Jack head over heels.

He saw at once the cause of alarm—a dozen children outside on the balcony and clambering over the railing; at least half a dozen of the small noses flattened against the glass. Tom was in a broad grin; prim Maud looking shocked, and Flossy in very wide-eyed wonder. Charlie was turning the catch of the long window. In an instant the tribe were inside; in another instant the whole house would be informed that "Cousin Jack was hugging Miss Carrington in the library."

"Hello!" exclaimed Tom.

"What ith you doin'?" said Flossy.

Jack tumbled his shock of hair with an action of despair, then met the emergency like a good fellow and a clever good fellow as he was.

"I was telling Miss Carrington a story," he asserted, facing the small inquisitors.

Poor Belle, who could be cruel and vexing to a dozen desperate lovers, was scarlet and mute before these dreadful youngsters.

"Ho! I guess so," exclaimed Tom, doubtingly, but the smaller ones were arrested by Jack's impressive face, that bore a serious and seemly expression, defying scrutiny.

"I was telling Miss Carrington a fine story, a wonderful story, a story that scared her so I was obliged to hold her tight to keep her from screaming."

The grin faded off Tom's face, and Nelly looked amazed, yet reassured. The children had experience of Jack's stories, and a tragic effect seemed not unlikely.

"Yes," continued Jack, "there was a great deal of horror in it; knives and robbers, and dark night, and a massacre," he went on, in his deepest bass, and rolling his r's tremendously.

"Tell it to us, won't you?" asked Tom, fairly thrown out of certain vague suspicions.

"Oh, no! that story is not for children," answered Jack, skillfully whetting the curiosity.

There was a storm of demand at once. It is human as well as child-like to want exactly what is not fit for us.

"Give us the massacre," shouted Tom.

"Yeth, give uth the mathacre," echoed Flossy.

"What's a massacre, anyway?" inquired Charlie, honestly.

"It's when some people go and kill some other people all of a sudden in the night, and it's wicked," explained Maud to every one's satisfaction.

Jack was set upon by the whole crowd. He had drawn their attention from the situation so awkwardly surprised, and the next thing was to distract them thoroughly; then, for fear the elder ones, after the excitement had passed, should return to the incident, Belle's consent must be obtained, so the attack of a dozen cousins could be met with the frank avowal of an engagement. Talk about your heroes facing the enemy! Think of Jack with battalions of raillery and gossip on all sides except one, and on that the fearful uncertainty of a coquettish girl who has not yet said the final word.

"Sit down, all of you, and keep very still," said Jack, impressively—"Miss Carrington here by me, because she's nervous; Tom on the left—so; and Tot on the floor at my knee. There. Now, attention all! This is the story of the 'Dreadful Massacre.'

"It was sunset. A gallant tribe assembled with much state and clatter. They spoke together in their own tongue pleasantly and peacefully. There were fathers and mothers and little ones. They had plenty and to spare of fine things to eat. They lodged in excellent houses; they brought up their families with care; they harmed nobody; they were good and innocent. There was a grand feast that evening; their costumers were rich with the luster of satin and bright with scarlet color. The young fluttered about gayly, and were happy and fond and foolish, and the old looked on with calm content. Then all went to their comfortable homes and to rest.

"The night crept on—dark, dreadful night; the moon hid behind black clouds; the owls went hoot-toot, and the frogs went kerchuck, and the beasts roared in the forest, and ugly bats flew about, and the wind whistled in at cracks and over bleak fields. The ghosts and goblins and wicked things all came out and walked round and round, and the whole world seemed groaning and weeping before the dreadful deed."

"What dreadful deed?" asked Christine, in a whisper.

"Hold your tongue and you'll see," said Charlie, very much interested.

"Then there came stealing across the country," Jack went on, with intensity, "a band of armed men—cruel men with wicked clubs and great long knives—and they came to the peaceful homes where every body was asleep."

"Wath they buggerlarth?" interrupted Flossy.

"Not burglars but mur-r-derers," answered Jack, his voice growing deep and rolling in the style of muffled drums or distant thunder.

"Said one to another," growled Jack, with melodramatic breaks and starts, "Shall we take 'em alive or shall we murder 'em sleeping?"

"'Mur-r-der 'em, stab 'em, strangle 'em, old and young alike; spare not one,' was the answer from a great man brandishing a naked blade. So they stole along," he explained, suiting the action to the word, "stooping, and crouching, and whispering, and exchanging signs, and then all at once they burst into the house." Here the story-teller grew loud and wild, his arms flew like wind-sails, his eyes stared horribly. "Oh, but there was a fierce struggle! Strong fellows waked from sleep and fought desperately for life; but the murderers slashed right and left. They strangled and cut off heads; there were wild cries, and flying forms, and confusion, and death, and blood—blood everywhere," roared Jack, with awful power, till every child trembled and Tot began to curl her under lip.

"Why didn't somebody help the poor things?" Charlie broke out, indignantly.

"I'd have helped 'em," added Tom, eagerly.

"Why didn't you do it, then?" said Jack, with stern displeasure.

"Where did it all happen?" said Tom, stung by the reproof.

"Here—here, in this very town."

"Here!" exclaimed the children, shivering and looking over their shoulders, half scared, for twilight was falling.

"Yes, here," groaned Jack, "and only yesterday. Innocent creatures struck down in the midst of life, mangled and cut to pieces. Oh, children!" pointing with a terrified face, "I see their ghosts outside the window there. Hush! are you afraid of ghosts? If you are don't look round—don't look round."

"I ain't afraid of 'em," said Tom, weakly; still he didn't look round. Flossy shrieked, Maud shut her eyes, and Tot, who couldn't understand the story, was crying hard in sympathy, while Jack stood like a dreadful enchanter in the midst of the trembling group.

"Send the ghosts away, Cousin Jack," suggested Charlie, very humbly.

"Children," spoke Jack, in sepulchral tones, "you have been tormenting me to-day, and I have half a mind to run off and leave you." Prim Maud clutched at his coat. "But on one condition I'll light the gas and not scare you any more."

"What is it?"

"Will you obey?"

"Yes, Cousin Jack."

"Then cover up your eyes, every one of you; don't dare look out of a corner. You, too, Miss Carrington."

All the eyes were duly covered, half in genuine fright at the story and the twilight and the ghosts, half in play.

"Now say, every one of you—you too, Miss Carrington—'Jack, I love you!'"

The children yelled in chorus, but Jack only listened for one voice, and that not a shrill one.

"Heads down, eyes shut a moment more," he roared. "Don't look up for your lives." There was a little delay, then a match was struck, the gas flashed bright, and the children rubbed their eyes and burst out laughing.

"What people were killed, Cousin Jack?" they clamored. "Tell us true, won't you?"

"There were no people killed."

"What did you mean, then?"

"The dreadful massacre of—"

"What?"

"The Thanksgiving turkeys."

"But the ghosts?"

"Look out of the window."

Three tough old gobblers were stalking across the garden in lonely state.

The children screamed with fun. Tom boasted, "Ho! I knew it was gammon all the time," and Jack was dragged in triumph to the drawing-room in the midst of the laughing group.

"You look happy, Jack," remarked grandpapa, peering benevolently over his spectacles.

"It makes one happy to tell the dear children pleasant and useful stories," answered Jack, like a hypocrite.

"Such an excellent, simple-minded fellow is our Jack," spoke grandpapa, approvingly, to one of the aunts.

"Thay, Couthin Jack," said Flossy, in her high-pitched lisp, "wath anybody kithing anybody when we had our eyth covered up?"

"Nonsense, child," answered Jack, aloud, and then, in a fierce whisper, "Hold your tongue, you monkey!"

But lively Nell had quick eyes, and began to laugh and tease.

"Bless me, Nellie," said Jack, coolly, "you're late. We've been engaged some time, haven't we, Belle?"

"Oh, yes, some little time," she asserted, conscious of literal truth.

"Just three minutes," added Jack, inaudibly.

Cousin Nell was quiet, not being inclined to publish that an engagement standing for "some little time" had escaped her observation; so the matter came out gradually and gracefully, after all.

Burke and the Grasshopper.

The greatest men have been noted for the breadth of their sympathy. Everything, even the most trivial, seemed to interest them. They gave a broader meaning to the famous line of Terence than he did—"I am a man, and think nothing alien to me that interests men."

While Edmund Burke was preparing for the trial of Warren Hastings, he made an appointment with Sir Philip Francis to read over some important papers relating to the case. Sir Philip called, and found Mr. Burke in his garden, holding a grasshopper.

"What a beautiful insect is this!" said Burke. "Observe its structure, its legs, its wings, its eyes."

"How can you," answered Sir Philip, "spend your time in admiring a grasshopper when you have so many things of moment to attend to?"

"Yet Socrates," observed Burke, "if we credit Aristophanes, attended to a much smaller insect, and actually measured the proportion which its size bore to the space it passed over in a skip. I think the skip of a grasshopper does not exceed its length. Let us see."

"My dear friend," replied the impatient and unsympathizing Sir Philip, "I am in a great hurry. Let us go in, and you listen while I read these papers to you."

They walked into the house, and Sir Philip began to read to the listening (apparently) Burke. Suddenly the reader paused to find a misplaced sheet.

"I think," broke in Burke, "that naturalists are now agreed that locusta, not cicada, is the Latin word for grasshopper. What is your opinion, Sir Philip?"

"My opinion," answered Sir Philip, rolling up his papers, "is that till the grasshopper is out of your head it will be idle to talk to you of the concerns of India;" and he walked out of the house.

A BOLD FARMER BOY.

Thrilling Adventures of a Youth in Pursuit of Horse Thieves.

[illegible]

Sunday morning, at about 1 o'clock, a valuable pair of bay horses were stolen from the farm of Mark Tracy, near Cokato. Mr. Tracy was absent at the time. His son James, an able-bodied lad of 19 years, was, however, at home, and, hearing a noise, got to the stable as soon as possible, and discovered the loss of the bays and the only saddle. In another stable Mr. Tracy had a pair of gray horses. James put a bridle on one and started in pursuit. The gray was an old companion of the boy, and during the entire pursuit that followed was allowed to have her own way in following.

The gray mare first led toward Howard, east four miles, then turned west upon the road south of the one first traveled, to a point south of Cokato village, half a mile distant. At this point Tracy plainly heard the horses a short distance ahead, going rapidly. Here, Tracy, not being sure that his revolver was reliable, drove into Cokato and obtained a good one, alarmed the town, and started anew. The gray mare led off due west to Collingwood, four miles, then south six miles, then again due north past Dassel to Crow river, fourteen miles. Here Tracy discovered the thieves on the opposite bank. He fired at them, but they put spurs to their horses and soon disappeared in the darkness. All parties now drove rapidly some seven or eight miles, Tracy often hearing the thieves ahead, but not overtaking them until just as he drove over the brow of a hill he met one of the stolen horses loose, and immediately was saluted with, "Here, Tracy, you —— of a ——, we have you now," and Tracy saw in the dusk of approaching morning one man standing in the road and one upon the other stolen horse. Tracy was going at a terrible rate of speed, was unable to stop, and as he passed both robbers fired several times. Tracy drew his revolver, wheeled and came back, when the robbers fired again. Tracy received two bullets in the left breast and one through the hat. Tracy fired at the mounted man, who fell to the ground, and then turned to the other, receiving at that time a shot which hit both his horse and himself; he was dismounted, but held to the bridle. He then poured, at a distance of less than two yards, three shots at the robber, who dropped his revolver, staggered back, then fallied and fell. In the meantime the other one had left the last horse and the field together. Tracy took the stolen saddle from the bays, put it upon the gray mare, picked up the robber's revolver and came home, overtaking the first-abandoned horse three miles from the scene of battle. Tracy knew that he had been hit several times, but, feeling no serious effects, made no examination till he arrived at Cokato, sixteen miles from the fight. Here he found one bullet-hole through his hat, with a furrow cut in his hair, close to the scalp, and three holes directly over his heart, all intercepted by a large, heavy pocket-book, well filled with paper. The book had a pasteboard cover, and, with the contents, was an inch thick. The bullets penetrated his coat, overcoat, vest, pocket-book, and three shirts, one of the bullets abrading the skin slightly, drawing blood. His horse was shot through the base of the left ear. The bay horse mounted by the robber was shot by Tracy in the conflict, across the back of the neck, plowing a track through the mane. Tracy fired eight shots in all. The robbers fired ten or more. On each horse they found a good halter, which the robbers can have by calling and proving property.

Interesting Life Insurance Suit.

A case of unusual interest to policy-holders in life insurance companies was recently tried in New York. The plaintiff was the widow of Leon Furniss, who was insured in September, 1874, for $10,000; the defendant was the Mutual Life Insurance Company, of New York, in which the policy was written; and the case involved the question of the extent to which habits of drinking alcoholic liquors could be carried without vitiating a life insurance policy. When the deceased was examined for the policy he stated that he drank at times, but that he was of temperate habits. He was accepted as a good risk, the policy written containing the usual clause that it would become void by suicide. Mr. Furniss died in 1877, from a wound in his side, inflicted by a pistol in his own hand. The company refused payment of the policy, setting up that the deceased had died by his own hand; that he had grossly intemperate habits, which tended to shorten his life, and that his statement that he was a temperate man was a misrepresentation that voided the policy. Suicide was not proven. On the day preceding his death Mr. Furniss had been disturbed by the stealing of one of his dogs, and had threatened to shoot any one detected in such business. He rose on the morning of his death, calling his coachman and chambermaid, and with the idea in his mind that his dogs were being stolen. Leaning out of the window, he was shot accidentally. It was admitted that he drank, but it was denied that his intemperance was of the extreme kind charged. It was shown, by expert testimony, that he was strong and vigorous, with firm nerves and will. His physician testified that moderate drinking was beneficial to health. On the other hand, a physician in the employ of the company gave evidence that any alcoholic drink, in the smallest quantities, tended to shorten life. The attorney of the company advantaged by the fact that he was once counsel for the widow in a divorce suit brought against her husband on the allegation of habitual drunkenness, and was rebuked for such breach of professional conduct. The company claimed that it was a misrepresentation to contend that it did not permit its policy-holders the moderate use of alcoholic drinks, but insisted that the constitution of the deceased had become shattered, his nerves unstrung, and his mind affected by his habitual intemperance. A verdict was given plaintiff for $11,474, but an appeal was taken.

THE HOME DOCTOR.

EYE WATER.—Take half a pound of grapevine,—[illegible]—put it in one quart of water, boil it down to one gill; take four tablespoonfuls of this liquid of the grapevine, three teaspoonfuls of fine table-salt, three teaspoonfuls of white vitriol, mix them in one pint of soft water, then strain through filtering paper. For application drop one drop in the eye every morning and evening. If too strong at first, weaken with a little soft water.

CURE FOR NEURALGIC PAIN.—"Elise" sends the following to the Inter-Ocean: "This simple recipe, signed "B. B. J.," which I clipped from an old paper, has proved of inestimable value to many: 'Some time since, while suffering from neuralgic pains in the face, it occurred to me that egg poultice might relieve. Mixing an egg with corn-meal, or any coarse flour, proved not only in this case when applied, but in many since, equally effective.' My mother, after having suffered two or three days and nights with severe toothache and face-ache, tried the above remedy, and experienced relief in a few moments."

A NEW REMEDY FOR WHOOPING-COUGH.—Dr. Garth, of Vienna, proposes a singular treatment for this distressing ailment, which will doubtless receive careful consideration from the medical profession. He states that by placing twenty drops of the oil of turpentine on a handkerchief, holding it before the face, and taking about forty deep inspirations, to be repeated thrice daily, marked relief, succeeded in cases of laryngeal catarrh by speedy cure, is the result. Being called in to attend an infant of fifteen months in the convulsive stage, he instructed the child's mother to hold a cloth, moistened as already described, before it when awake, and to drop the oil upon its pillow when it slept. In this instance the remedy in its effect was most beneficial. The frequency and severity of the attacks sensibly decreased in the course of twenty-four hours, and by proper support by the help of stimulants improvement was rapid.

IN CASE OF ACCIDENTS.—Prof. Wilder gives these short rules for action in case of accidents: For dust in the eyes, avoid rubbing; dash water into them. Remove cinders, etc., with the round point of a lead pencil. Remove insects from the ear by tepid water; never put a hard instrument into the ear. If an artery is cut, compress above the wound; if a vein is cut, compress below. If choked, get upon all fours and cough. For light burns, dip the part in cold water; if the skin is destroyed, cover with varnish. Smother a fire with carpets, etc.; water will often spread burning oil and increase the danger. Before passing through smoke, take a full breath and then stoop low; but if carbon is suspected, walk erect. Suck poison wounds, unless your mouth is sore; enlarge the wound, or, better, cut out the part without delay. Hold the wounded part as long as can be borne to a hot coal, or end of a cigar. In case of poisoning, excite vomiting by tickling the throat by water or mustard. For acid poisons, give alkalies; in case of opium poison, give strong coffee, and keep moving. If in water, float on the back, with the nose and mouth projecting. For apoplexy, raise the head and body; for fainting, lay the person flat.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

CHINESE history says that wheat was introduced into China 2700 B. C.

OF the total of 8,481 sets of woolen machinery in the United States, 1,418 are in Massachusetts, 331 in Maine, 505 in New Hampshire, 175 in Vermont, 469 in Rhode Island, and 669 in Connecticut—a total for the New England States of more than 43 per cent. of the woolen machinery in the entire country.

THE new Austrian Reichsrath is composed as follows: Sixty-eight lawyers, 138 landed proprietors, 40 employes in active service or pensioned, 11 employes in private service, 13 professors, 36 merchants and manufacturers, 6 railway directors and engineers, 6 medical men, 21 clergymen of various confessions, 7 military men not in active service, 4 literary men, and 2 members with no particular avocation. From this it will be seen that the class of landed proprietor heads the list, and next to them the legal profession.

STATISTICS officially compiled for the German Government show that the present population of the empire very considerably exceeds that of 1816. In 1875 it was 42,727,360, for the whole country, of which Prussia had 25,742,204, and Bavaria 5,022,370; in 1816 the population of the whole country was 24,831,396; for Prussia, 13,706,978, and for Bavaria, 3,697,036. The figures for the other and smaller states are in about the same proportion, being in the average an increase of nearly 100 per cent., notwithstanding emigration and war.

THE following statement, recently issued by the War Department, gives the number of men supplied the Federal army by each State and Territory and the District of Columbia from April 15, 1861, to the close of the war of the Rebellion. It shows that the total number of volunteers was 2,678,967, divided as follows:

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

A TALENT without a tact has been said to be like a fiddle without a fiddle-stick.

THE more a man accomplishes the more he may. An active tool never goes rusty. You always find those men the most forward to do good, or to improve the times and manners, always busy.

DON'T flatter yourself that friendship authorizes you to say disagreeable things to your intimates. On the contrary, the nearer you come into relation with a person, the more necessary do tact and courtesy become.

SABBATH READING.

Prof. David Swing on the Idea of a Future Life.

All the ideas which are now found in the intellect of man have a history, just as truly as Russia, or England, or France has a history. As our earth began with small things, and is now full of much larger things—a larger architecture than that which first built a hut or scooped out a cave; a larger painting or sculpture than that which first made the rude outline of a man—there must be a history of the things which moved across this distance between littleness and greatness. Each profession, that of medicine, or law, or school teaching, had an experience just as personal and distinct as the experience of an Alfred, or a Napoleon, or a Franklin; the difference between these two forms of experience being only this: a man will close up his history in his three score and ten years, while an idea never completes its history. It may repose for a time, but it is liable to come back and resume again its broken-off action. Select, for example, the notion of a God, and what a history, could it be composed, would not follow that conception in the human intellect! We should, to grasp this notion, be compelled to study the whole career of man. If man has been upon the earth for fifty or a hundred thousand years, it would be necessary for us to pass over that long path and note all those forms of polytheism, and pantheism, and image-worship, to the belief in which he may have built altars in the long march. At one point we should find the devotee offering his own child to a sacred ox; again, should we see the scene change, and see an ox offered to the shade of the child or of the child's ancestors; again, at some other point in the progress, we should see doves, and pigeons, and lambs bought and sold in large numbers to carry forward the worship of the highest powers.

From one idea we must judge all. No truth or dogma so humble that it has no biography written down in the vast book of nature. There are ephemeral insects, it is said, which live only one day. One day and night begin and close their experience. But to them that day is a career. There are stranger things in nature. There is a plant which opens almost the loveliest flower man ever beholds, and which pours forth perfume enough to fill a cathedral with holy incense; and yet that plant opens its flower only in the dead of night, and opens it but once. Two hours of color and sweetness contain the birth and death of this beautiful member of the floral band. But who will say that these two hours are not a history? Indeed, they make up a better record than the half-century of many a man stained with vice, or inaction, or crime. The life of many a rose is better than the life of many a man.

These allusions illustrate the fact that all the notions in the human soul possess an individual history, and may, and should be, studied faithfully in the mirror of such retrospection. In the survey of the poverty and riches of yesterday we can see the doctrine of a second life passing through its varied forms of essence and accident. As immense men have lived, and immense nations have lived, making a powerful contrast with the ephemeral insect and the ephemeral flower, so great ideas have emerged from the old chaos, and great among these lofty ones must be confessed the thought that all who die here will live again. There is only one greater notion in the human mind—the notion of a God, but the belief in a God and the worship and love of such a Being depend so much upon man's assumption of an existence beyond the grave that these two thoughts possess a dependent greatness. Each idea leans upon the other, and is strong in such support.

In making a rapid survey of this belief I would remark first that the probability of the truth of a second life does not depend upon any universal belief or dream. We were all once taught that there must be a heaven and a hell, because all tribes, even the most savage, have expected rewards or punishment after death. Of late years such argument has been failing in strength, partly because races have been discovered which hold no belief in a second world, and which hold no valuable conception of this life, and partly because philosophy has lost faith in what was once called innate ideas, and has come to believe that humanity works out its truths and its notions by its thought just as it works out its principles of law, and mechanics, and architecture. Good theological notions are no more born with man than a true astronomy or a good civil law are born with him. Labor conquers all things; the Labor omnia vincit of the Latins being one of the most universal laws of the universe; and when we recall with what toil our ancestors wrought out the principles of liberty and justice, and with what thought and wearing away of brain and soul have come all our inventions and progress, we may well be ashamed to ask the African Bushman what may be his opinion about God or immortality. If he should have any hope of a second life one might be glad of it, but should all the barbarous races be fully convinced that man dies as a tree, that unanimity of the children of the woods would weigh nothing, for should they agree that civilization were a calamity, and literature a weakness, we should not feel affected by their common consent. Labor brings out ideas, just as it gives us railways and telegraphs, just as it gives us the luster of the diamond; and, when we would learn anything of value about the idea of immortality, we must move about in the world of active mind, and not among the wigwams of the savage, nor among the bushes of the African.

Strike intellectual development where you may, in Egypt, or Chaldea, or Canaan, or Greece, or old Italy, and out of that mental action of man this notion that this world is not all appears in more or less of distinctness. Were it in harmony with historical inquiry we might ask here, what are the rational supernatural reasons man has revealed for any such belief; but such discourse belongs to a metaphysical form of study and not to our task for to-day. As a fact in human experience the thought of a greater and better world has been one of the most constant companions of man in his highest estate. In its long path this wandering thought has had to undergo many transformations. It has been not less unfortunate than those companions of Ulysses, who fled from the witchery of one island only to find in their next landing-place that they were in the net of some other enchantment. The one central thought has been that the grave does not terminate the life of man. Unable to complete the human or the divine scheme on this side the death-bed, a world has been seen beyond; but in decorating or draping this world the mind has been subject to no law, and has therefore luxuriated in the broad field of imagination and fancy. First in history came the Egyptians. Their records go farthest back. The common supposition is that they embalmed their dead in the belief that the absent soul would, at some time, return to claim the body and wake it to new life and new beauty; but that this was their reason for embalming there is no adequate proof. Aside from this treatment of the body the future of the soul was quite fully wrought out in the Egyptian religion. A judgment bar was seen to which all the dead advanced to receive sentence. It was much like the final judgment of the Christian theory. The questions were regarding the deeds done in the body. Upon the tombs at Karnak and elsewhere on the Nile, tombs inscribed 1,600 years before our era, one may read the fact that a blessed future could result only in good deeds in this life. The judges over in eternity asked questions of conduct, and, if the conduct had been good, the soul was admitted to heaven; if sinful, the soul was sent to torments where it was to be purified in flames. At last these souls became pure and happy. The Egyptians were the restorationists of antiquity.

Next to the Egyptians the Hebrews and the Greeks stand in historic nearness. In the Hebrew writings the doctrine of a second life appears, but without being prominent and without much of detail. There are no ancient holy writings from which immortality is more generally absent than from our Old Testament, except the writings of Confucius. This must have come to pass from the fact that most of the Old Testament is the history of a state, and not the religious meditations of the Hebrew thinkers at large. The Hebrew authors are all politicians, and not deep thinkers like Plato, and like the Egyptian wise men. Were we in our day left to learn the doctrine of immortality from our political institutions, or from Bancroft's "History of the United States," we should not feel that Americans knew much or thought much of a world to come. The Old Testament is largely the history of a state. Not only are the first books up to the poem of Job all historic, but the prophets were all busy predicting calamities or successes for the nation; and even the psalms were national hymns, hymns for the theocratic throne and legislature rather than for an individual fireside religion. There is no one treatise in the Hebrew scriptures in which the writer attempts to set forth the religious belief of the twelve tribes. All mention of religious doctrine is incidental rather than formal. Even the account of the creation of the universe is only the lifting of a curtain that all may see the origin of the Hebrew race. Had there been any Jewish great men besides the political leaders, we should now possess perhaps some one treatise full of all the details of that faith which filled Palestine and its borders for twenty centuries. As the facts are, we must learn from incidental records what must have been a common opinion with the old Children of Israel. These incidents betray a belief in that same spirit-land which encompassed the contemporary nations. Even in a cold history little camp-fires of another life are seen brightly. Enoch walked with God, and was carried to heaven without the intervention of death. Whether men less virtuous would pass to God through death is not related. Perhaps only those were immortal who were thus delivered from corruption and dust. Elijah, too, was seen to pass up among the angels, thus showing that beyond the tomb of the Jews there was a better land in the belief of the people. Well, Jacob lay down at night and dreamed, and he saw the angels of God passing down and up between earth and sky, thus showing us that to the Jew the great blue vault seemed peopled with spirits, and that Jocob placed amid these angels, the souls of the good who had died is hardly a matter of doubt. The ideas of angels and immortality are one.

Perhaps no incident in the Old Testament betrays better the old Hebrew belief than the story about the Witch of Endor. It is not the truth of the narrative that is valuable, but the indirect witness the story bears to the point that the Hebrews did not believe in annihilation, but in a future state. The story is, substantially, that Saul, being in great trouble over an invasion by the Philistines, and having no longer any living Samuel to consult, felt constrained to call for help from the spirit land. He seems to have had no doubt that there was such a land. He ordered, therefore, that some medium be sent for who could call upon the dead heroes, and the spiritualistic medium from Endor came, and, by some method now lost to mankind, enabled Saul to hold with his venerable father a military council. The merits of the narrative are of no moment, but the inference must be that between the living and the dead of that date there must have flowed only that narrow Charon which separates the Egyptian and the Greek, and which separates the Christian from an endless life. It may be that this belief among the Hebrews rose and fell and rose again, as it has done in all times; and that the Jews had periods of faith and of nothingness, for their history is long and varied; but it must be that in that great nation thought of a heaven and a hell played that part in the brain and the soul which they were playing along the Nile or in the Grecian peninsula. One essential thought ran through all; nothing was peculiar except the decorations of fancy.

A Stowaway's Terrible Death.

The steamship England, of the National line, arrived at New York recently from Liverpool. When her cargo was about to be unloaded a man was found leaning against a crate, who gasped out, "Water." He was terribly emaciated and weak. He faintly gave his name as Harry and said that he was a baker. He was asked if he had been all the time while the ship was at sea without food or drink, and he nodded once, shuddered, and died. The body was sent to the morgue. Nothing was found on him to indicate his identity but a piece of paper, on which was scratched the address, "Peter Hartman, baker, at Simpson's Soho Street Branch." The England was thirteen days making the voyage, and the stowaway must have been that length of time without food or water.

A Jolly Postmaster.

The Postmaster at Red Lake, Minn., in answer to an official circular from this division of the railway mail service, directing the return of a complete list of all local names, to which mail matter is sometimes addressed, and which are enrolled within his jurisdiction, responds in the following happy strain:

One hundred miles of mud and flood
Just now doth intervene
Between our happy hunting ground
And where the "locals" are seen.
We have no "locals,"
But the lake doth stretch both far and wide,
And when the wind is on its ear
In comes the rolling tide;
We have no rail,
But then we have the "injins" all the same,
And when the whitefish they can't take
They seek for other game.

He Couldn't Help It.

The wife of a well-known literary gentleman, while reading one of his articles for the press, corrected it as she went along, and the errors were numerous and bad. "Why, husband," she exclaimed, "you don't know the first rules of grammar, else you are very negligent." "Well, well, my love," he exclaimed, looking up from his work; "what's the matter now?" "Why, in three cases you speak of our sex in the plural, and write it in the singular number." "I can't help it," was the retort, "woman is a singular being."

THE RESULT IN NEW YORK.

(From the Cincinnati Enquirer.)

The elections which attracted national curiosity and attention were those in Massachusetts and New York. Would the Republicans lose Massachusetts? Would the Democratic party lose New York? The result in New York was, of course, the commanding question, for New York is the commanding State. The voice of New York, with her splendid and varied industries, her manifold manufactures, her imperial commerce, her various populations, with her bankers and laborers, her corporations and farms, and with her thirty-five electoral votes, was awaited with chief interest. It was believed that New York held the political destinies of the republic for a few years in her right hand. If the Republican party could succeed in carrying the great representative State of New York, a great Republican victory would be secured, the first substantial Republican gain of this year. But New York is still Democratic.

The defeat of Mr. Robinson was inevitable in the face of a formidable Democratic, or un-Democratic, bolt against him, which commanded votes, not by the hundreds, or thousands, as was expected by many, but by the scores of thousands. No candidate in any State could stand against such a defection; and it is amazing that such a defection in the Democratic party in New York did not entirely sweep away the party success, when the divided Democracy confronted a united Republican party, or the Republican party almost united.

The imperial State of New York is saved to the Democratic party in an hour in which a most unhappy and bitter quarrel placed that Democratic State in the greatest peril. It is a dangerous time when 50,000 or 75,000 men within a party in one State scratch the head of the ticket. It is a great party, of splendid discipline, of fine devotion, of matchless tenacity, that can pass safely through such a peril inside the party, when the greatest perils outside the party also needed to be overcome. Whatever the effect of the New York election may be upon individual candidates, if any, New York, in a trying time, appears as a Democratic State. Not even a stupendous Democratic quarrel in New York could give New York to the Republican party. Conkling rises as conqueror, not because he nominated the strongest candidate at Saratoga, but because he elected an unpopular candidate through Democratic divisions, and the Legislature is Republican. The power of Kelly, the tenacious Irishman, is evident, and it is not small. The effect upon Mr. Tilden must be coolly calculated. The great fact is of more importance than Mr. Tilden's ambitions or Mr. Kelly's spites, and it is that out of this year's election the Republican party carried no State which was not Republican before. Ben Butler is beaten in Massachusetts, but the Republican party is in a minority, even in that State. In the other elections there are no important changes. The Republican triumph of yesterday consists in the election to the Governorship of New York a man whom this Republican administration spewed out of office not long ago. The Democratic party again appears as the party of invincible hope, of perennial vigor, which no quarrel within the party and no foe without can conquer.

The imperial decisive State votes for the town-meeting Government, for the Democratic principle, the American principle, and protests against the destruction of the republic by a central power. The Democratic party once more rises up, a party of shining devotion, of unalterable convictions, that will die only with the republic.

Never Say Die.

We by no means give up the fight for 1880. In the history of wars and parties many a victory has been snatched from even greater reverses. The work to be done must be thorough—at once bold and unsparing. While the politicians at Washington are wrangling among themselves, the people at home must organize. Needless baggage must be left behind. We can afford to carry no dead weights. We must move up to the front, pledging the country:

1. The maintenance of the public credit inviolate, and an honest effort to advance the prosperity of the people without disturbing the operation of the simple forces—to which we owe the present revival—by experiments upon our fiscal system.

2. The cleansing of all the departments of the Government, and the establishment of a genuine system of civil-service reform in lieu of the prevailing maladministration.

3. The restoration to the people of their stolen sovereignty, accompanied by a fair and enlightened readjustment of our elective system, making it impossible to put the Government on wheels and run it into the several States as a machine for perpetuating the party that happens to be in power.

4. A constutional guarantee against outstanding war debts and liabilities growing out of the war of every description.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Waste.

There must be, of necessity, a percentage of loss in all the material transactions of every-day life, whether these be carried on in the workshop, the counting-room, the kitchen, or the laboratory; but this indvitable waste can be so far reduced by good management that it amounts to but little in the course of a year. Observation has convinced us that the loss in large workshops must be considerable, for in a great majority of cases we have seen materials lying about under foot—bolts, nuts, washers, kicking around in the mud out in the yard, new work exposed to injury from the elements, tools misplaced, essential articles, or tools necessary to the perfection of certain parts of the work, at great distances from each other, and an infinite number of abuses which, although small of themselves, when summed up make a grand total loss at the end of the year. As the thirty-second part of an inch too little on one piece of a steam engine, a sixty-fourth on another, and as much on still another will result in great derangement of the functions of the machine, so infinitesimal waste, continually occurring, is the representative of hundreds of dollars for which there has been no return. No matter what the nature of the trade or manufacture, it is very certain that a material reduction of the expenses of every department can be made by careful attention to the minor matters, and these remarks are made with the hope that all interested will give them attention.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Some Curious and Surprising Features.

Mr. Bissell, the Law Clerk, and Mr. Nickerson, the Topographer of the Postoffice Department, have prepared an interesting statement relative to the comparative use of postal facilities in Great Britain and the United States, and the result shows some curious and surprising features. Most of the figures are accurate, but some of them are estimated. The comparisons can be presented most readily in a tabular form as follows:

	United States.	Great Britain.
Population	45,000,000	31,483,790
No. of postoffices	41,483	13,768
No. of officials	54,847	45,506
No. of letters handled	737,000,000	1,057,732,790
Average No. of letters per capita	16	31
No. of postal-cards handled	300,620,000	109,267,300
No. of newspapers handled	914,848,400	128,556,000
No. of dead letters	2,694,233	4,575,695
Value of money-orders issued	$81,442,864	$125,899,994

It will be noticed that her Majesty's subjects write more letters than do the citizens of the United States, almost twice as many per capita. This is quite surprising, and no reasonable explanation can be offered, particularly as the number of illiterate persons in this country is proportionately smaller than in Great Britain. The fact that the rates of postage are lower there than here may have something to do with it. But it will be noticed, at the same time, that we used last year twice as many postal-cards as the people of Great Britain, and about eight times as many newspapers were sent through the mails in this country. This is remarkable, because the express companies in the United States handle almost as many newspapers as the postal service, while in Europe the express facilities are scarcely ever utilized for this purpose. The English people utilize the money-order system to a greater extent than the Americans. A noticeable fact is that the proportion of postal officials is much smaller in the United States than in England, which is partially explained by the circumstance that in England the carrier system is almost universal, while in the United States it is confined to cities of 20,000 inhabitants.

Extraordinary Adventure.

A most remarkable accident happened at the Hale & Norcross mine last night. A cage with six men was coming up the shaft at 11 o'clock—the hour for changing the shifts. When about 600 feet from the bottom, at a point where there is an irregular place in the guides, the cage suddenly lurched to one side, throwing the men to the other. Patrick Holland, who was on the outside, was crowded off. Instead of falling to the bottom and being dashed to pieces, he was safely lodged on a wall-plate. The other men on the cage supposed that he had fallen into the sump, of course. When they reached the surface they got the usual sacks and boxes and started back to the sump to gather up the fragments of the body. As they approached the place in the shaft where the man was thrown off, they heard a voice below them telling them to go slow. They did not know what to make of the strange discovery, never supposing it possible for Holland to be anywhere else than at the bottom. When they saw him safe on his narrow perch they could scarcely believe their eyes. Any one who has ascended a shaft knows how rapidly the wall-plates flit by when the lantern is held so as to bring them to view. The cage from which Holland was thrown was coming up at the usual rate of speed. How the man could possibly have been lodged on one of these pieces of timber without being jammed by the cage or knocked off as it went past him is a wonder. The wall-plate is a square timber, fourteen by sixteen inches, so that there was very little standing-room for Holland while he was waiting for the cage to come down and rescue him. If the shaft had been so light that he could look down any reasonable distance of the 600 feet between him and the bottom he would scarcely have had the nerve to cling to his narrow footing. The darkness of all mining-shafts is a point in favor of the miners preserving their coolness when placed in ticklish positions. A couple of pump-men will throw a foot-wide plank across a shaft 200 feet from the bottom and work upon it as though they were not five feet from the bottom. The darkness of the shaft prevents the thought of the awful abyss below from being constantly present.—Virginia (Nev.) Chronicle.

Western Farm Mortgages.

We clip the following from the Chicago Times of a recent date: "It has been studiously sought to impress the East with the idea that farming lands in the West are loaded down with mortgages which they can never discharge. This idea is altogether fallacious. It has been disproved many times. Boone county, Iowa, has been pointed out as one of the places where this woful condition of things exists. Much care and trouble have been taken to ascertain the facts, and it is found that the total mortgage incumbrance upon the agricultural lands of that county is not more than $175,000, or 5 per cent. of their total valuation of $3,500,000. A well-informed newspaper of Iowa vouches that this proportion will be found to be the rule throughout the counties of the State."

Miss Maud Banks, daughter of Gen. Banks, has made her debut at Brookline, Mass., as an actress in an amateur company. She intends to go on the professional stage. The General was once an actor.

INDIANA ITEMS.

The boys of Sullivan and neighborhood find sport in coon-hunting during moonlight nights.

Of late there has been more inquiry for building lots in New Albany than for many years.

The receipts of the State for the fiscal year ending Oct. 31 were $4,137,613.91; disbursements, $4,078,194.81.

The New Albany Steam Forge Works has been compelled to blow out on account of the exhaustion of their supply of coal.

An old lady residing in Union township, Shelby county, by the name of Miss Annie M. Baker, died recently of old age. She had reached the age of 95 years.

Spiker & Hamlon's wagon factory at Logansport was destroyed by fire, the other night. Loss, $40,000; insurance, $16,000. Fifty men are thrown out of employment.

B. F. Ibach, one of the Trustees of the Soldiers' Orphans' Home, at Knightstown, has been appointed superintendent in place of Dr. Hunt, resigned on account of ill-health.

Gov. Williams is pardoning convicts from the penitentiary on condition that they do not use intoxicating liquors any more. The Governor's temperance society now numbers four.

Geo. D. Mitchell, of Shelbyville, has, within the last week, buried three children, and a fourth is lying seriously ill. It is said that their complaint is whooping-cough, but some believe it to be scarlatina.

Thomas Josephs, the Washington county murderer, has been sent to the State prison for life, and the militia, who had been ordered to Salem to prevent mob violence, conducted the prisoner to his destination.

A well at Jeffersonville was cleaned the other day of the accumulation of the rubbish of ten years, when the workingmen came upon the well-preserved skeleton of a man. The question now is, How did it get there?

During a temperance meeting in the Indianapolis Opera House, Sunday afternoon, a lady who was sitting near the door fainted, causing some commotion. People in other parts did not realize what was the matter, and a panic was imminent, but happily averted.

As the Sheriff of Knox county entered the jail the other night, two prisoners secreted behind the door made a break for liberty. Refusing to stop at the demand of the Sheriff, he fired, and the ball passed through the back of one, named Moyles, with fatal effect. The other prisoner surrendered.

James Calaway, the pioneer African of Sullivan county, died last week, aged 97 years. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, having enlisted during the Indian outbreak in 1811. He served in Gen. Harrison's command in the march from Vincennes to Tippecanoe, was in the battle, and served with Gen. Harrison during the war. In 1814 he settled near Carlisle, where he has lived ever since, owning a small farm.

A most horrible casualty occurred at Millersburg one night last week. Three children of a family named Vance were playing near the kitchen stove, when the stove fell over, throwing a wash-boiler full of hot water over them, scalding them in a shocking manner. Medical aid was summoned, but of no avail. One died soon after, another expired next day, while the third was no doubt fatally scalded.

THE LOWEST THEY HAVE BEEN FOR TWENTY YEARS

When teas a few years ago sold at $1.50 and $2.00 per pound the extreme high prices almost kept the use of tea as a luxury; this is not so any longer. Teas are now relatively cheaper than coffee and the demand for them so increased the last five years that we now sell 2 and 3 chests daily. We keep up our usual motto of no middlemen. Our teas go direct to our customers and we purchase direct from importers, thereby saving them the three profits of the speculators, jobbers and wholesale merchant, which is at least 16 to 20c per lb.

Florence, the actor, tells this story of the elder Booth: "He was playing Hamlet in Virginia one night and had no skull. A little darkey volunteered to get one. When Booth was leaving the theater he felt someone tugging at his coattail. He looked around and saw the little brunette. "What will you have, sonny?" "Please, sah, I want daddy's skull, sah." "Daddy's skull?" "Yes, sah. Dat used to be de ole man's head-piece afore de mewel kicked him, an' mammy'll lick me ter rags ef I lose it."

Strictly fresh reminiscence of General Grant: When a boy in Ohio, or somewhere else, Grant drove a milk wagon. Among his customers was a colored family. As he drove up one day to the domicile of this colored patron he bethought him to have a little fun at the expense of a pickaninny that was making mud pies in the dooryard, and so addressed it: "You Ephraham, take dat chalk out ob yo' eye!" Ephraham's mother happened to be just around the corner of the house hoeing the watermelons, and hastening around in front she almost yelled in her indignation: "See heah, honey, you hab all you kin tend to ef you take dat chalk out ob yo' milk."

An Expert Forger.

[New York Times.]

One of the most expert forgers that ever appeared in this country was caught in Massachusetts lately, convicted, and sentenced to ten years imprisonment. He had not been in prison more than three months when, to the astonishment of the jailer, a pardon came for him, in due form, all signed by the governor and properly countersigned. There was nothing to be done but liberate the prisoner, and he walked out. But he had not been gone long before the jailer discovered that the prisoner had managed, through his friends, to get a blank pardon from the governor's office, had filled it out himself, and cleverly forged the signatures, and had then passed it out to his friends again, to be mailed to the jailer in proper shape. The clever forger had not gone far enough away to escape and he was arrested and sent back to prison. He employed a young New York lawyer, whose name is familiar through the fame of his father, and told him the story. "They have no right to lock you up again," said the lawyer, "having once liberated you, without legally proving that the pardon is a forgery. I can get you out, but it will cost you $1,500." "Go ahead!" said the forger. The lawyer went ahead, gained his case and liberated the prisoner. "I am going out west immediately," said the forger, as soon as he was free. "My father, who is a wealthy man, owns a $30,000 farm in Kansas, and he has just sent me this letter, begging me to come home and lead an honest life, and telling me to draw on him for $2,000 to pay my bills. I am his only son, and I have almost broken his heart; but this life is coming to an end; I shall settle down on my father's farm and be an honest man," and he showed the letter, a pathetic production from an afflicted parent. "I shall need $1,000 of the money to pay some little bills," continued the forger, "and here is a draft I have made on my father for the $2,000. If you can give me a check for $1,000 I will give you the draft, and will send you the other $500 as soon as I got home." The lawyer read the letter carefully, drew a check for $1,000 and handed it to his client, and received the draft for $2,000. About ten days after the draft was deposited in a bank for collection, it came back with the message that the man on whom it was drawn had been dead for eight years, and wasn't worth a cent when he was alive.

Pause, Ponder and Peruse!

The invention of that Superior and Complete Sewing Machine (The Family Sewing Machine), marks one of the most important eras in the history of machinery and when we consider its great usefulness and extremely low price ($25), it is very difficult to conceive of any invention for domestic use of more or even equal importance to families. It has great capacity for work; beautiful, smooth, and quiet movement, rapid execution, certainty and delightful ease of operation, that at once commends it above all others The working parts are all steel, strong and durable, and will last a life time; the bobbins hold 100 yards of thread; the stitch is the firmest of all the stitches made, neat and regular, and can be regulated in a moment to sew stitches from an inch in length on coarse material down to the finest, so infinitesimal as to be hardly discernable with the naked eye, and with a rapidity rendering it impossible to count them as fast as made; it has more attachments than any other, and it does to perfection all kinds of heavy, coarse, plain, fine, or fancy needle-work with ease, and far less labor than required on other machines. It needs no commendation, the rapid sales, increasing demand and voluntary encomiums from the press, and the thousands of families who use them, amply testify to their undoubted worth as a standard and reliable household necessity, extending its popularity each day. Machines sent anywhere to be examined before any money is paid. Agents wanted by the Company, Address them for information. Family Sewing Machine Co., 755 Broadway, New York. 43-1y.

Special Announcement.

We take pleasure in announcing that we have made arrangements with the publishers of the STATE SENTINEL which enable us to make the following very liberal offer:

To all persons who pay their subscription account to date, we will send the COURIER and WEEKLY SENTINEL one year for $2.50 in advance. In addition to this we will make each subscriber a present of "THE LAW OF THE FARM," by Jas. B. McCrellis, of the Indiana bar. This valuable phamphlet ought to be in the hands of every farmer in the state. The work embraces the following subjects:

1st. How to buy a farm.
2nd. How far the farm extends, or its proper boundaries.
3rd What the deed of a farm includes.
4th The farmer's rights in the road.
5th As to farm fences.
6th As to estray and trespassing animals.
7th The farmer's liabilities for his animals.
8th Of dogs—the farmer's liability for and protection against.
9th Of water rights and drainage.
10th Of trespassing on the farm.
11th The rights of adjoining proprietors to fruit and other trees on and near boundary lines.

The INDIANA WEEKLY STATE SENTINEL is an eight-page paper, (the same as the COURIER) and will contain a supplement of two additional pages about half of the time. It is the recognized organ of the democracy of Indiana, and will always be found full of news of a general character. Its editorials present strong argument in favor of economy and against class legislation, and its agricultural department is adapted to the wants of every farmer.

Remember that the $2.50 must be paid in advance; and the COURIER subscription account must be paid to date, in order to secure this liberal offer. tf.

Grant as a Mendicant.

[State Sentinel.]

It has been sometimes said that "republics are ungrateful," but the assertion, though it has passed into history, will not bear investigation. The gratitude of republics is not less generous than that of monarchies; in fact, it is more generous, for it is more widely distributed. If the circumstances calling for gratitude be a military victory, republics do not, as a general thing, bestow it upon the individual who happens to be in command. The fact is recognized that the commanding general did not shed all the blood, kill all the opposing forces nor run all the risk of life and limb, and, therefore, is not entitled to all the gratituda. Hence, republics are inclined to reward the common soldier with a portion of their gratitude. This is not the rule with the monarchies where the common soldier is of scarcely more importance than dumb animals, and, whether dead or alive, receives precious little attention, and as for gratitud none at all. In the case of General Grant, however, the republic of the United States has departed from all accredited traditions of republics It has done little else but to bestow upon him rewards in testimony of its gratitude. He was rapidly promoted from a colonel to major general, and then to a still higher office, with pay and perquisites that would have enabled him to live in princely style during the remainder of his life. But this was not enough. The gratitude of the American people, prompting them to make no note of the schemes of partisans, found expression at the ballot box, and General Grant was twice made president of the United States, for which he received the sum of $300,000, and with other sums drawn from the treasury for services, General Grant has probably received not less than a half a million of dollars. All of this does not appear like ingratitude. On the contrary, it shows a larger amount of gratitude than was ever before lavished upon an American citizen. Grant now claims to be poor, and the republican organs are setting up a howl about the ingratitude of the United States as compared with that of the British government. While some of the republican papers are trying to work up a Grant presidential boom, others are pegging away to put money into Grant's pocket, and the general is, in a quiet way, helping on the financial boom as best he can. That Grant is seeking to make the impression that he is now flat broke is very clearly set forth in an interview at Omaha, where he expressed a willingness to take the position of a railroad conductor. The following is a portion of the reported interview:

Editor—Excuse me, general, for putting a leading question concerning your future home. What foundation is there for the report that you intend locating west of the Missouri river?

General Grant—There is not much foundation for such report. I am as yet undecided where to locate. If I should conclude to go west of the Missouri I would either locate at Denver or San Francisco. Although I am really without a home, I shall make Galena my home for the present, I shall have to go to work at some occupation next summer, and in all probability I shall then locate in Chicago.

Editor—So you have no idea of making your future him in this section of the country?

General Grant—As I said before, my preference would be either Denver or San Francisco. I should prefer a position as mining engineer or railroad conductor.

Just now Grant is entertaining all sorts of propositions for employment, from president of a nail factory to president of the United States: from the position of president of the Isthmus Canal company to a railroad conductor. From such statements, the conclusion is inevitable that Grant is out of spondulicks and ready to take almost any job that offers, at small wages. As a matter of course, this is all low demagoguery, but it answers for a text upon which republican sheets may preach for Grant's pecuniary benefit. The Chicago Tribune is foremost in the business. It thinks Grant is not well fixed for the remainder of his life. True, we paid him while he was in the army, provided a life office for him when the war was over, then paid him for being president, but that is not enough. The "nation" must keep on paying, just to show that as a "nation," we take care of our presidents when out of office; play guardian over them; make annual preparations for their support; give them fast horses, well trained hounds, elegant mansions and send them on pleasure trips around the world. To make a man president the Tribune thinks is an "empty honor;" a "glittering reward," with no money in it. Grant wants the substantial—money, houses, land—and all because he was a general in the army. If congress would create the office of field marshal at $30,000 a year, appoint Grant and then retire him on half pay, the general might get along without feeling the pangs of thirst or hunger, but in the opinion of the Tribune the United States should do for Grant what the British government did for Wellington; for Grant is, in its estimations, a bigger man than the iron duke, because he made the United States a nation with a big "N." England gave Wellington $4,115,000 in cash, $70,000 a year in pensions, and raised him to the summit of the peerage, while Grant has only received about $500,000 and the "empty, glittering reward of the presidency." Something ought to be done to get Grant out of politics he is as much a disturbing element as was ever the negro. If the government has got to take care of him—feed and clothe and shelter him—let the fact be understood, so that the committee of ways and means can provide for it. The country is getting tired of this Grant obligation business; and Grant, if he has half the sense he is credited with, ought to stop his nonsense about finding employment, getting work, etc. It disgusts all sensible people. It is a bid, in the wrong direction, for sympathy, and its purpose is well understood.

A Moving Palace.

This is truly an age of wonders, and among them are, talking by lightning, walking on air, on the wings of the wind, and transferring, as it were, a whole orchestra over hundreds of miles of wire. These are no greater than the rapidity of travel on the railways, however, as the hurrying trains every day show. There are always new conveniences and improvements in the manner of travel which add greatly to the comfort of those who are journeying. One of the latest, though it has been in use some time, is the Pullman Hotel Cars, where one is always "at home," and can eat, walk, talk, or sleep, as he chooses. Go down to the Chicago & North-Western depot any evening, or any morning, and you will see the moving palace. The Pullman Hotel Cars were put on the Chicago & North-Western Railway about the first of July, last year, and they have proven to be an unquestioned and decided success. The cars are beauties, and a person can get aboard at Chicago in the morning and ride through to Council Bluffs without leaving the car, and still have all the conveniences of any of the most elegant hotels. They are on the European plan, "You pay only for what you get." If you have never seen them, it will pay you to go down to the depot some evening and go through the train.—Cedar Rapids (Ia.) Daily Republican.

In these Hotel Cars the meals are a la carte—you pay for what you get, and nothing more; and this at very reasonable rates.

The managers of the company have determined to omit nothing which will add to the convenience, safety, and comfort of the traveling public who favor them with their patronage; and further, that they will not be eclipsed in this direction by any other railroad in the world. Hence these cars, constructed by the Pullman Palace Car company especially for the Pioneer Line, are the finest ever built.

It is not exaggeration to say that no road in the world can produce the equal to these magnificent cars, and as the average traveler wants the best of everything that can be had, he must of necessity use this line in his trans-continental trip.

The charges for berths in these Hotel Cars are the same (and no higher) as are made in the more common Sleeping Car, so that the traveler using one of these palatial hotels is given much more worth for his money than he can get on any other line.

Remember! Pullman Hotel Cars are now running regularly between Chicago and Council Bluffs, on the Denver and California Express Trains of the Chicago & North-Western Railway. Westbound, they leave Chicago daily, except Sunday, (and on every third Sunday,) from the Wells Street Depot, at 10:30 a. m., and arrive at Council Bluffs next morning. East bound, they leave Council Bluffs at 5:30 p. m., daily except Saturday, (and on every third Saturbay,) and reach Chicago the next afternoon.

Bear in mind! No other road runs Pullman Hotel Cars, Pullman Dining Cars, or any other form of Hotel, Dining, or Restaurant Cars through between Chicago and the Missouri River. On no other road can you get all the meals you require between Chicago and Omaha without leaving the car you start in. This is the only line that has through eating cars of any sort.

A Hoosier Edison.

Charles Reitz is now preparing a new cigar lighter, upon which he has a patent, which takes the shine off of everything in that line yet invented. It will have the appearance of an ordinary cigar lighting gas jet, but will have a spiral of platinum connected with a small battery by means of the usual wire in such a manner that when not in use the power to the battery is preserved entirely, and the moment any one desires to light a cigar the power is applied and instantly the platinum is brought to a white heat. This heat is created as the lighter is brought down to the cigar. It does away with the [illegible] of the [illegible] that comes from all the other cigar lighters now in use, and is, besides, a novelty, which is what the people demand.

Mr. Reitz says he is going to transfer by electricity, over a wire, a portion of power from some steam machinery near at hand sufficient to turn some of the lathes in his shop.

Among the stories going the rounds about Senator Chandler is one illustrating his bluff manners. He was much chagrined at the president's neglect of him after the inauguration, and had hoped for a place in the cabinet. In his disappointment he refused for many months to go to the White House. Finally he went. Shortly after his return here from a trip home as a private citizen he met the president, who grasped his hands warmly, and with an air of patronage said: "Well, Chandler, I suppose your old constituents were glad to welcome you home again?" "Yes, Mr. President," Chandler replied, "I met with but one man who seemed discontented. He is an old republican and taking my hand on seeing me he said: "Chandler, I believe you are an honest man; you never did steal anything but the presidency, and that, as it turns out, is only petty larceny.' Confidential relations were not resumed on that day.

How Silver Ore is Sold at Leadville.

The business of buying and selling ore in a camp like this, when the output of the mines is so immense and the value of dollars so great, has been reduced to a science, and is by no means, as many have supposed, dependent upon the fair dealing and honesty of the mill men, who generally are the purchasers The large mining corporations and wealthy individual owners of productive properties have their own assayers as well as their own scales at the mines. So far as practicable, similar ores from the different pay streaks are piled together for shipment, under the distinguished titles of hard carbonates, iron, dark sand, gray sand, and many other varieties of ore. The assayer makes frequent assays for the purpose of keeping a general knowledge of these separate kinds of ore, yet such assays are not the basis upon which sales are made, owing to the fact that such samples may be either too high or too low for the bulk of such lots, and the correct sampling must be arrived at by the process customary at the sampling works of reserving so many pounds, at regular intervals, out of a given weight of ore as it is being crushed. This system gives approximately the true value of the bulk of ore to ascertain which is equally to the interest of the buyer and seller. Samples from these bulk samples are assayed by the mill men and by the owners, and if the ounces closely tally, the price to be paid is arrived at.—Leadville (Col.) Times.

IS GRANT INSANE?

What a California Newspaper Ventures to Say on the Subject.

[San Francisco News Letter, Nov. 8.

Rumors are afloat that General Grant shows signs of a malady that is hereditary in his family. It is said that his father, Jesse Grant, was afflicted with softening of the brain before he was 60 years of age, and that during the last years of his life was little more than an imbecile. Orville Grant, whose eccentric conduct in California only last year, will be remembered, has since been an inmate in the New Jersey Insane Asylum. It is also said that one of the general's sisters has been afflicted the same way. Many people who have met General Grant since his arrival in San Francisco have noticed an occasional wild, strange look in his eye. Often when conversing with gentlemen, and even with old friends, he has stopped short in the middle of a sentence and hesitated, sometimes for a full moment, before completing it. At San Jose he was introduced to a number of soldiers who fought with him at Fort Donaldson. Instead of greeting them cordially he turned half around and simply stared at them over his shoulder and never said a word. Again, at Stockton and at Maderia he was presented to a number of his old comrades in the Mexican war, but the general treated them in the coolest manner, and in a way that left the impression on every one present that he was displeased at meeting them. These, and many other instances of his peculiar conduct, go to show that it is a sad probability that his mind is commencing to weaken. While in the presidential chair General Grant was noted for his affable greetings to all his visitors and on no other hypothesis can the great change in his manners be placed, than that there is something wrong in his mental faculties. Perhaps the great strain on him for the 15 years of his eminent public career has had something to do with the change in him that is now so painfully observable. Another evidence of his approaching affliction is the unevenness of his conversations. At times he will talk with fluency and ease, and then in a few minutes relapse into an attitude of perfect silence, and only answer questions by a "Yes" or a "No." We most sincerely hope that the great calamity of a "mind o'erthrown" may never be visited upon the illustrious general and statesman whom San Francisco and all the world has delighted to honor. It would be a national affliction were he to become incapacitated for future usefulness.

Another Scheme.

It is being hinted by some of the republican papers that the New York legislature which meets this winter should select the presidential electors for the next meeting of the electoral college in 1880. As the legislature is largely republican, this scheme would give New York to the republican candidate for the presidency without doubt. If this new radical dodge should develop into anything near a consummation, it might be well enough for Governor Williams to call the Indiana legislature together and let it select Indiana's electors in the manner proposed by New York radical papers for that state, and Governor Bishop might call the old legislature of Ohio together for the same purpose, as the new legislature of Ohio does not assemble until after the first of January. With Ohio and Indiana thus arranged for, perhaps we might yield New York to the tender mercies of a republican legislature. —State Sentinel.

Pause, Ponder and Peruse!

The invention of that Superior and Complete Sewing Machine (The Family Sewing Machine), marks one of the most important eras in the history of machinery and when we consider its great usefulness and extremely low price ($25), it is very difficult to conceive of any invention for domestic use of more or even equal importance to families. It has great capacity for work; beautiful, smooth, and quiet movement, rapid execution, certainty and delightful ease of operation, that at once commends it above all others The working parts are all steel, strong and durable, and will last a life time; the bobbins hold 100 yards of thread; the stitch is the firmest of all the stitches made, neat and regular, and can be regulated in a moment to sew stitches from an inch in length on coarse material down to the finest, so infinitesimal as to be hardly discernable with the naked eye, and with a rapidity rendering it impossible to count them as fast as made; it has more attachments than any other, and it does to perfection all kinds of heavy, coarse, plain, fine, or fancy needle-work with ease, and far less labor than required on other machines. It needs no commendation, the rapid sales, increasing demand and voluntary encomiums from the press, and the thousands of families who use them, amply testify to their undoubted worth as a standard and reliable household necessity, extending its popularity each day. Machines sent anywhere to be examined before any money is paid. Agents wanted by the Company, Address them for information. Family Sewing Machine Co., 755 Broadway, New York. 43-ly.

$150 per Week Made Easy.

Horse and Wagon Free to Agt's

The CHEAPEST and BEST in the World.

Too Long in Use to Doubt Its Superior MERITS

No Money to Pay until Machine is Delivered to you and Examined.

It makes the shuttle, double-thread, lock-stitch, (the same on both sides of the work), which received the highest reward at the Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia, Pa., 1876. And is complete with a larger assortment of attachments for fine work than any other machine, and reduced to only $25.

It is an easy and pleasant machine to operate, requires the least care, produces every variety of work, and will last until the next century begins. Strong, simple, rapid and efficient.

Use it once and you will use no other. The money cheerfully refunded if it will not outwork and outlast any machine at double the price.

Agents sell them faster than any other in consequence of their being the "best at the lowest price."

Each machine throughly warranted with written guarantee for five years. Kept in order free of charge; money refunded at once if not satisfactory.

It is the most solid, reliable, and satisfactory machine ever invented for all kinds of family work. It is an acknowleged unequivocal mechanical success, thoroughly tested and used in thousands of homes. An efficient, silent, rapid, reliable and ever ready helper to the weary wife or seamstress, it will do the work of a family for a lifetime, or it will earn from $4 to $5 per day for any one who wishes to sew for a living. This machine costs less than half the price of any new machine of like quality. Has extra long, large-sized shuttle, easily removed. Extra large-sized bobbins, holding 100 yards of thread, doing away with the frequent rewinding of bobbins. It is built for strength and constant hard work. Interchangeable working parts, manufactured of fine polished steel. Will run for years without repairs; is simple to learn, easy to manage, understood perfectly in an hour, and always ready in a moment to do every description of heavy or fine work, at less cost or trouble than any other machine at any price ever did or can do. It will sew anything a needle can pierce, from lace or cambric to heavy cloth or harness, with any kind of thread, and will run off twenty yards per minute; it uses strong, straight needles, and never breaks them It cannot miss or drop a stitch, ravel or break the thread. If you have any other machine, buy this and have a better one. The ease and rapidity of its motion and quality of its work, are its best recommendations. It will hem, fell, tuck, braid, cord, bind, gather, quilt, ruffle, pleat, fold, scallop, shirr, roll, baste, embroider, run up braids, etc. with elegance, ease and quickness, unsurpassed by any machine ever invented.

BEWARE OF IMPOSITION.

The price for our new machines are less than those asked by dealers in second-hand, rebuilt and refinished machines, or those selling out old stock to close up business, many such inferior and old style machines being offered as new at reduced prices; beware of imposition and only buy new machines. There are no new first-class machines offered as low as the "FAMILY," by many dollars.

Machines Sent for Examination Before Payment of Bill.

Extraordinary inducements offered to clergymen, teachers, storekeepers, etc., to act as agents. Horse and wagon furnished free. For testimonials see descriptive books, mailed free with samples of work, liberal terms, circulars, etc. Address,

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

A FIRE broke out in a tenement house in Cannon street, New York, and spread so rapidly that several of the inmates were unable to escape. Joseph Batzkie and Mary Basbaski threw themselves from a window and were killed. Batzkie's family, consisting of wife, two children and mother-in-law, were suffocated. A policeman named Lynch received fatal injuries in a vain endeavor to rescue the doomed family.... Charles Drews and Franklin Stichler were hanged at Lebanon, Pa., Nov. 14, for the murder of Joseph Raber. Drews and Stichler were members of a gang of six implicated in the murder of Joe Raber, at Indiantown gap, for the purpose of getting the insurance on his life. They held Raber's head under water until life was gone....Myron A. Buell, aged 20, was hanged at Cooperstown, N. Y., on the 14th inst., for the murder, on the 25th of last June, of Catherine May Richards, aged 15 years.... James P. Ferguson, living near Hopkinsville, N. Y., went to that town the other day, to persuade J. H. Combs to marry his sister, whom he had ruined. Combs refused to keep the premise of marriage, whereupon Ferguson purchased a double-barreled gun, loaded both barrels with buckshot, and, going to Combs' store, emptied both barrels into him.

THE WEST.

A REMARKABLE phenomenon was witnessed at South Bend, Ind., a few days ago. A whirlwind struck the Polish Catholic Church, a large wooden structure with a steeple a hundred feet high, and containing two large bells, and demolished it to atoms. The wreck is so complete that it looks as if a powder explosion had occurred. Two bell-ringers were in the church at the time, but escaped with a few scratches. The whirlwind gathered and spent its force in this one spot.

DISPATCHES from Los Pinos Indian Agency, dated Nov. 14, state that the Peace Commission was fully organized and in full blast. Present, Gen. Hatch, Gen. Charles Adams, Chief Ouray, First Lieut. Gustavus Valois, Ninth Cavalry, recorder and legal adviser; J. T. Townsend, of New Mexico, interpreter. Chiefs Douglass and Johnson were present, and quite nervous, notwithstanding their efforts to appear at ease. As the commission sits with closed doors, nothing will be known in relation to its proceedings until the official report reaches Washington.

A DISPATCH from Los Pinos Agency, in Colorado, says of the Ute peace council: "The Indians who testify before the commission are sworn by Chief Ouray according to the custom of the Ute nation. Douglass was the first witness called at the order of Ouray. He arose from his seat, and, standing erect, with his arm raised, he administered the oath to himself, as follows: 'By the heavens above; by the earth that will receive me; by the Great Spirit that looks down upon me; I dare not speak anything but the truth.' This was said with much force, and with appropriate gesture. He saw nothing, heard nothing, and took no part in killing Meeker and the employes and in the fight with Thornburgh. Chief Johnson knew even less than Douglass. To the question, 'Do you know whether there has been any fight at White river?' he answered, 'No.' None of his relatives were in the fight, so far as he knew, and he could not give the name of a single Indian engaged in the killing of Meeker and the employes nor the troops."—It is gradually becoming known that the hostile Utes during their recent council determined at first to kill Commissioner Adams, but that they finally decided on the course they have pursued. This part of their proceedings was not translated to Adams, and he now only finds it out through Ouray and other Indians.

HON. BENNING W. JENNESS, formerly United States Senator from New Hampshire, and who narrowly escaped the Democratic nomination for President in 1852, died a few days ago in Cleveland, Ohio, aged 73 years.... As a freight train consisting of sixteen cars was crossing Macoupin creek, on the Chicago and Alton railroad, in Greene county, Ill., the structure gave way, precipitating nine cars into the stream. The engineer and a brakeman were killed, and the fireman was badly injured. The bridge was a new iron truss of 154 feet span.

MAX MARETZEK and his new American opera "Sleepy Hollow" are now paying Chicago a visit, holding the boards at McVicker's at the present time. Of the musical merits of the opera "Sleepy Hollow," it is enough to say that it is a delightful performance. It was brought out at the Academy of Music, New York, and instantly made a success in that metropolis. The cast as distributed in the company is as follows: Katrina Van Tassell, the belle of Sleepy Hollow, Miss Annie Montague; Frau Van Spuyter, Mrs. Florence Rice-Knox; Abraham Van Brunt, Mr. Charles Turner; Heinrich Van Ness, Mr. L. Fink; Ichabod Crane, Mr. W. C. Gardiner; Baltus Van Tassell, Mr. Burnett; Frau Van Tassell, Miss Ada Whitman; Annie Stelf, Miss L. West.

ALBERT WOODWARD, wife and two daughters, started from their home in Jefferson county, Ind., in a spring wagon. In crossing Clifty river the swift current swept the wagon and mules down stream. Mr. Woodward attempted to cut the harness, but was washed away and thrown out on the bank. His wife and daughters were drowned....A Buffalo dispatch says that when seventy miles east by north of Point au Pelee, a severe squall struck the schooner C. G. Breed, capsizing her and drowning all on board excepting two men, Frank Davis and David McAllister. The vessel lay on her side for twenty minutes, the crew clinging to her sides and rigging all that time. She then filled and sunk. As she did so she righted. Frank Davis, who was clinging to the masthead, was lifted out of the water. He remained in this position until he was rescued by a crew sent out by the propeller Milwaukee. The crew consisted of Capt. Rose and eight men, all of whom but Davis and McAllister found a watery grave....It is reported that Jay Gould has purchased the Missouri Pacific railroad, running from St. Louis to Kansas City. The price paid was $3,850,000 cash.

ADVICES from Los Pinos Indian Agency to the 18th inst. are to the following effect: Chief Sowerwick was the next witness after Douglass and Johnson. He proved himself either the greatest ignoramus or the greatest liar of any Indian that has yet appeared before the commission. He knew absolutely nothing about the massacre or fight, and even denied the fact that Gen. Adams slept in his tent while at White river. There is evidently an agreed plan on the part of the Indians to furnish no information of any kind, and, by this means, thwart the wishes of Ouray and the object of the commission. After Sowerwick had given his lying testimony, Gen. Adams addressed Ouray, pointing out that Sowerwick had testified falsely, and adding that he did not believe that Sowerwick, or any other of the Indians, intended to tell the truth. He asked Ouray to recommend some other plan by which the Government might ascertain who were engaged in the White river difficulties. Said he: "We want the guilty parties; and, if you think we cannot find out who they are, we had better go home." Ouray responded: "I cannot force them to say what they do not wish; I brought them here that they might speak for themselves." He afterward added: "Show me any act of law by which a man is compelled to convict himself." Ouray afterward acknowledged he was afraid of assassination. At last accounts he was very ill. Owing to the indisposition of Ouray, the commission adjourned till Monday the 24th. Ouray informed Gen. Adams he will accomplish the purpose for which the commission was convened, and bring the guilty parties to justice, if he dies in the attempt.

AT Leadville, Col., a few nights ago, a barber named Bockhouse, while returning from his work, was stopped by three footpads and commanded to throw up his hands. He immediately did so, having a self-cocking pistol in his hand, with which he instantly killed one and shot another in the arm and captured him. The next afternoon Bockhouse was borne through all the principal streets in a chair on the backs of men, followed by a large procession of men bearing a banner inscribed on one side the words "Footpad Exterminator," and on the other side "Terror to Robbers." A purse of $1,000 was raised by the citizens and presented to Bockhouse.

DENVER papers give accounts of terrible suffering during the recent storm in the vicinity of Leadville. Two men crossing Mosquito pass from Leadville were frozen to death, and a third was killed by a wagon running over him. A man with his team on the summit was blown away, and no trace of him can be found. A stage-coach was upset, and one passenger killed and several wounded.

A TUNNEL in course of construction on a narrow-gauge railway between San Jose and Santa Cruz, Cal., has been the scene of a frightful explosion, resulting in the death of twenty-five or thirty Chinese laborers. San Francisco dispatches give the following particulars of the calamity: It appears that the blast was let off about 2,700 feet from the mouth of the tunnel, which caused an explosion of gas generated by the filtering of coal oil through the roof and sides of the tunnel. Twenty-one Chinamen and two white men were at work in the tunnel at the time. Immediately about twenty more Chinamen rushed into the tunnel with torches to aid their comrades. When they had penetrated about 1,500 feet their torches caused a second explosion more violent than the first, shaking the mountain to its center. Two white men, Linkle and Johnson, were brought out terribly burned, and about ten Chinamen, all seriously injured. As near as can be learned some thirty Chinamen are killed.

ONE of the severest gales experienced on Lake Michigan for many seasons occurred on Wednesday, Nov. 19. The storm was severest on the east shore, where a number of vessels were wrecked and stranded, though, luckily, there is little or no loss of life to report—thanks to the efficiency of the life-saving service. At Grand Haven, Mich., there was a remarkable series of disasters, following each other in rapid succession. First the scow Maple Leaf, lumber-laden, missed her piers and went ashore; she is a total loss; the life-saving crew saved all on board. An hour afterward the schooner J. A. Holmes, light, went on the beach near her. Later still, the schooner Margaret Dall went on near the Holmes, and then came the schooner C. O. D., which went on high and dry a few feet further north of the Dall. The last-named was soon followed by the schooner Mystic—all this in the space of an hour or two. Then came the steam barge Gen. Paine, which struck the Grand Haven bar, and sunk in eighteen feet of water. Just thirty minutes after she struck, the crew were taken off by the life-saving men after a gallant fight with the wind and waves. Next the schooner Robert Howlett tried to get in, but could not, and went ashore.

PECK & BAUSHER'S lard refinery, on Illinois street, near the lake shore, in Chicago, was destroyed by fire a few nights ago. Loss, $65,000; insurance, $44,000.

GRANT will again visit Chicago about the 5th of December, and make a three days' stay. On the 9th of December he is booked for a reception at Indianapolis. Louisville will take a look at him on the 10th, Cincinnati on the 11th, and Pittsburgh, Harrisburg and Philadelphia on succeeding dates. After his visit to Washington, he will go South, spending the winter either in Cuba or Mexico.

DISPATCHES from Los Pinos Agency of the 19th of November state that "the last forty-eight hours have witnessed a decided change for the better, and the prospects for a peaceful solution of the White river troubles may safely be predicted. Ouray informs the commission that the reason why the Indians refused to testify at first was a fear of arrest, but now that they are satisfied of good faith on the part of the commission they will all be here inside of six days, Jack among the number, and we shall have the Indian version of the whole affair. The day on which Douglass gave his testimony he had an escort with him, who were prepared to defend him in case of arrest. The hostiles met the commission with the intention of telling a consistent lie throughout, but Gen. Adams' coup d'etat brought them to a realizing sense of their position, and they are now pleading for peace. They are thoroughly frightened, and the fears of a winter campaign against them have exacted the promise to honestly testify and abide the consequences. They say, 'One big fight, and the Indians' ammunition all gone. No food, and we starve.'"

REED & SONS, the well-known music and piano dealers of Chicago, have made an assignment for the benefit of their creditors.

IT is estimated that the business of Chicago was about doubled during the three-days' stay in the city of the crowd that came to see Gen. Grant. A rough estimate makes out that the principal hotels made a gain of about $28,000—not to mention the smaller ones; the restaurants a gain of from 300 to 500 per cent.; the ready-made clothing houses, about 50 per cent.; Field, Leiter & Co., a gain of about $50,000, and other houses in proportion; the saloons, an inestimable amount. The visitors probably left behind them about $1,125,000 for actual expenses. The cost of patriotism to Chicago, in decorating, etc., was about $50,000.

LATER and more extended accounts of the gale which swept the lakes on the 19th and 20th of November show the damages to have been vastly greater than first reports indicated. The east shore of Lake Michigan suffered the greatest, the beach being lined with the wrecks of luckless vessels that were caught out by the hurricane. On Lakes Erie and Huron the gale was not so violent, but a number of vessels were wrecked. There is no great loss of life to report, but the stories of hair-breadth escapes of the unfortunate mariners who were compelled to face the elements are numerous.

THE SOUTH.

THE man Williams, who attempted to assassinate Mr. Nix, the colored Postmaster at Blackville, S. C., has, with two others, been arrested on a charge of conspiracy by United States officers. They are bound over for trial in the United States Court at Columbus.

A CANTON (Miss.) dispatch mentions the arrest of Eliza Pinkston, of Louisiana Returning Board fame, on the charge of murdering her husband, who died suddenly and mysteriously.

GENERAL.

THE following is the condition of wheat, tobacco and corn, as reported by the Department of Agriculture at Washington: Wheat—Returns show an increase in the wheat crop of 26,000,000 bushels over last year. This great increase is the result of a very large yield in all the States bordering on the Ohio river and the Missouri. The Northwestern States show little variation from last year. Kansas and California both decline in yield. Texas, of all the Southern States, is the only one that falls off in the yield this year. Tobacco—The indicated product for the entire country is 98 per cent. of that of 1878. Corn—The corn crop promises an increase of over 200,000,000 bushels, or nearly 15 per cent. over that of last year. The Atlantic gulf coast States note some decrease, but other sections of the Union have greatly increased their yield. The Southern inland State's increase nearly 20 per cent. over other sections; Mississippi valley nearly 20. The Pacific States report about the same yield as last year.

ADVICES from Cuba received in New York by mail show that the new insurrection in that island is a formidable one. The patriots have defeated the Spaniards in one pitched battle, and are gathering in force for an advance on Puerto Principe. It is expected by their leaders that thousands of slaves will join them, and that by the time reinforcements from Spain arrive the insurgents will be prepared to deal with the augmented army of the Captain General.

LATE advices from Havana indicate that the Cuban insurrection is more formidable than the meager accounts hitherto have indicated. There have been several important engagements, in which both sides claim to have been victorious, but the weight of the testimony is in favor of the insurgents, who are organizing in large numbers.... The United States Supreme Court has just rendered a decision declaring the Federal law relating to trade-marks to be unconstitutional. This decision operates to destroy the value of some 8,000 trade-marks now registered in the United States Patent Office, and to throw out about 200 applications for registry now pending.... A new ocean telegraph cable has just been laid across the Atlantic, from Brest, France, to Cape Cod, Mass. This makes the fifth telegraphic cable connecting Europe and America.

EX-PRESIDENT GRANT, after a week's round of festivities, embracing receptions, banquets and dinner parties, bade adieu to Chicago on the morning of Wednesday, Nov. 19, and returned to his home in Galena. A chronology of the week's events, briefly summarized, stands about thus: Wednesday, grand reception and procession by the citizens and military evening, Army of the Tennessee reception at Haverly's Theater. Thursday, reception by the veteran soldiers at McVicker's Theater; evening, grand banquet at the Palmer House. Friday, private reception at Col. Fred Grant's residence; evening, reception and banquet at the rooms of the Chicago Club. Saturday, Gen. Grant received the veterans of the Mexican war, and received and shook the hands of the public at the Grand Pacific Hotel. Sunday, he attended the Centenary Church (Rev. Dr. Thomas). Monday, he reviewed 40,000 school children at the Exposition building, and in the evening attended a reception by the Calumet Club. Tuesday, he attended a reception by the Loyal Legion at the rooms of the Chicago Club, visited the Protestant Orphan Asylum and made a long speech, and in the evening attended the Second regiment reception at McVicker's Theater. Wednesday, Nov. 19, at 10 a. m., left for Galena.

A SERIOUS disaster on Lake Ontario occurred a few nights ago. The tug Seymour of Ogdensburg, left Cape Vincent with four tugs, three dredges and eighteen scows in tow for Buffalo. During the night a gale was encountered, and three tugs and all of the small dredges and scows were lost. One tug was picked up, and the Seymour arrived at Sackett's Harbor. Of the crews nineteen persons were saved. Twelve were lost.

THE Society of the Army of the Cumberland, at its annual meeting in Washington last week, in response to letters from the wife and daughter of the late Gen. Robert Anderson, denying the charges of disloyalty against the deceased, adopted the following resolution offered by Gen. Sherman:

> Resolved, That the heartfelt sympathy of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland is hereby tendered to the wife and daughter of the first commander of the army of the Cumberland; that the society will ever bear in honorable memory his pure and noble character and his heroic devotion to his country, and that they will ever regret that his ill-health in 1861 prevented him from reaping the fruits of his valor and courage in the cause of the Union, and that nothing but poverty prevents them from erecting a suitable testimonial over the honored grave of Gen. Robert Anderson at West Point.

Toledo, Ohio, was agreed upon as the place, and September, 1880, as the time, for the next meeting. The following officers were chosen for the ensuing year:

President—Gen. Phil H. Sheridan.
Vice Presidents—Gen. Underwood, Massachusetts; Gen. Barnum, New York; Gen. Carmer, New Jersey; Gen. Negley, Pennsylvania; Gen. Duffield, Michigan; Col. Hobson, Kentucky; Capt. E. E. Rhum, Tennessee; Gen. Morgan, Illinois; Gen. Streight, Indiana; Gen. Myer, Ohio; Col. Johnston, Wisconsin; Col. Conover, Missouri; Gen. Martin, Kansas; Capt. Wood, Minnesota; and Capt. Sellеck, Iowa.
Recording Secretary—Capt. Steel.
Corresponding Secretary—Gen. Cist.
Treasurer—Gen. Fullerton.

WASHINGTON.

THE report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office shows that the gross proceeds of the disposal of the public lands during the fiscal year, ending June 30, 1879, were as follows: Cash sales, $894,840.93; fees, commissions, etc., $980,314.93; total, $1,875,155.86. The total number of acres of public lands disposed of during the fiscal year under the Homestead and Timber Culture laws, and by the location of warrants and scrip, was 8,881,398.93.

ADMIRAL AMMEN, of the United States navy, recently called upon President Hayes with a letter from an acquaintance in Paris, assuring him of a satisfactory arrangement in Paris for the immediate advancement, when required, of one-third of the capital necessary for the Nicaragua inter-oceanic canal enterprise by one of the most substantial banking houses of Europe, upon condition that Gen. Grant will consent to accept the Presidency of an American company organized for the construction of the work.... Assistant Secretary of State Seward has tendered his resignation.

THE Washington Grand Jury has found an indictment against John Hitz, late President, and Charles E. Prentiss, late cashier of the German National Bank of that city, for embezzling $59,620 in cash and $5,000 in the stock of that bank....A Washington dispatch says the loss to the Government in the amount of money received by Postmasters throughout the country the past two years will be less than 1-20th of 1 per cent....The formation of Supervisors' districts, under the provisions of the Census act of March 3, 1879, has been completed by Superintendent Walker, except in regard to the States of Massachusetts and California. The appointments of Supervisors must be made in each instance by the selection of applicants residing within the boundaries of the respective districts.

AT a Cabinet meeting last week the decision of the Supreme Court that the Federal Trade-Mark law is unconstitutional was referred to, and, in view of the existence of treaties with several foreign nations under which we have guaranteed trade-mark protection in this country to their subjects, it was agreed that the President should request Congress to enact some legislation on this subject which shall be free from the objection of unconstitutionality, but afford protection to foreign trade-marks.

COMPTROLLER KNOX, in his annual report, advocates the immediate retirement of the greenback circulation. According to the showing made by the Director of the Mint, the coin now in the United States aggregates more than $600,000,000. This, with the issues of the national banks, the Comptroller regards as sufficient for the needs of the country.

COL. JOHN HAY, author of "Little Breeches," has been appointed Assistant Secretary of State, in place of Frederick W. Seward, recently resigned. Mr. Hay is an Ohio man, as well as a newspaper man.

POLITICAL.

ACCORDING to Collector Beard of Boston, the President has a surprise in store for the country in his forthcoming message, it being nothing less than a recommendation that the greenbacks be retired and destroyed.

JUDGE BEAMAN has declined the appointment of United States Senator from Michigan to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the Hon. Zachariah Chandler. Gov. Croswell has conferred the honor upon ex-Gov. Henry P. Baldwin, of Detroit.

A CALL has been issued for a conference in Washington, on the 8th of January next, of Chairmen of the State Committees of the Greenback-Labor and National parties and the editors of Greenback newspapers, with a view to determining upon the policy of nominating candidates for President and Vice President of the United States in 1880.

FULL returns from all the counties in Mississippi show the Legislature of that State to consist as follows:

	Dem.	G.	Rep.	Ind.
Senate	34	2	1	0
House	96	16	5	3
Total	130	18	6	3

There are six colored members of the Legislature, four of whom are Republicans, one a Greenbacker and one a Democrat—the latter from Yazoo.... An Albany dispatch gives the following as the pluralities by which the Republican candidates for State officers are elected in New York: Cornell, for Governor, 35,676; Hoskins, for Lieutenant Governor, 1,150; Carr, Secretary of State, 3,159; Wadsworth, Comptroller, 6,619; Wendell, Treasurer, 3,274; Ward, Attorney General, 7,333. Horatio Seymour, Jr., Democrat, is elected State Engineer by about 10,000 majority. Legislature—Republican majority in the Senate, 18; Republican majority in the House, 56. Majority on joint ballot, 74.

SOUTHERN gentlemen in Washington are said to favor a movement by members of Congress from the South to create the office of Captain General of the army, with a salary of $50,000 per annum, and give it to Gen. Grant for life.

IN Wisconsin the majorities of the Republican candidates over the Democrats at the late election are as follows: Gov. Smith, 25,494; Lieut. Gov. Bingham, 26,047; Secretary Warner, 26,085; Treasurer Guenther, 28,881; Attorney General Wilson, 25,683; Superintendent Whitford, 21,836. The above figures are liable to some change upon refooting, but they will not be varied over fifty either way.

FOREIGN.

THE organic complaint from which Prince Bismarck is suffering is said to be an incipient stage of fatty degeneration of the heart, as yet but slightly developed. There is no immediate cause for apprehension....A Berlin dispatch reports that Russia is daily striving, but ineffectually, to come to special friendly relations with Germany.... The London correspondent of the Liverpool Courier says: "Sir Austin Layard, British Ambassador to Turkey, has been instructed to hold no further communications with the Porte regarding Asia Minor, but to send for a British fleet, so that it may anchor in Turkish waters within a few days. Subsequent proceedings will depend on whether the Turks proceed to the fulfillment of their promises."

THE British military authorities in Afghanistan have arrived at the conclusion that Yakoob Khan, now a prisoner in their hands, was the prime mover in the insurrection at Cabul. The theory accepted in army circles is that he incited the populace to attack the British embassy, under the impression that a hostile demonstration of that character would force Cavagnari to withdraw, but it is believed that he contemplated the wholesale slaughter which followed.... Diphtheria, which for several years has made great ravages in Russia, seems to be gaining more and more ground. The disease has attained such frightful proportions in some of the regions that the percentage of mortality far exceeds that of birth. The mortality both of youthful and adult population is so enormous that the Government has appointed a special commission under M. Karel, physician in ordinary to the Emperor, to inquire into the cause of the epidemic.... Official circles in Spain are greatly alarmed by the news from Cuba of the rapid spread of the insurrection reinaugurated there a few weeks ago. Several interpellations have been made in the Cortes, to all of which answers showing the gravity of the situation have been returned. It is claimed that, while the insurgents are widely scattered and intrepidly led, they do not number over 3,000; but the fact that heavy reinforcements will be sent forward at once seems to prove that the colonial army is inadequate to suppress the revolt.

LATE advices from Mexico mention but two revolutions now in progress. These are in Yucatan and Chihuahua, the former in the extreme southeastern portion of the republic and the latter on the northwestern frontier. The pronunciados have captured the cities of Chihuahua and Merida, and federal troops have been sent against them....A daughter of Gen. Sickles has greatly scandalized her friends and relatives by eloping from Paris with an adventurer named McCarthy, a Southerner and a married man....A Cabul dispatch says that forty-nine Afghans have been hanged for complicity in the massacre of the British Embassy. The inquiry into the Ameer's connection with the massacre has begun....Thirteen persons returning from a fair were drowned while crossing the Loochindaal, of the Scottish island of Islay....A dispatch from Pesth says the distress in Montenegro is very great. One-sixth of the population is almost starving.

A ROME telegram confirms the statement that an agreement has been reached between Germany and the Vatican. Mgr. Jacobini, Papal Nuncio at Munich, will visit Berlin in December, probably to confer with Bismarck, who is said to have made important concessions in the recent negotiations....The former Confederate cruiser, Shenandoah, which in late years has been owned by the Sultan of Zanzibar, was recently sunk in the Indian ocean, and most of the crew drowned.

THE Americans are busy at Alexandria, Egypt, with the removal of the obelisk presented to the city of New York. The obelisk has been cleared to the base, twenty feet below the present level of the soil, and it now stands on a block of granite weighing forty tons, which again rests on three wide slabs. The whole goes to New York.

THE British authorities in Ireland are proceeding to vigorous measures for the suppression of what threatens to be a formidable revolutionary movement in that country. Michael Davitt and James Bryce Killen, of Dublin, for making "seditious" speeches, and James Daly, the editor of the Connaught Telegraph, for "seditious" editorials, were last week arrested and thrown into jail. These arrests naturally inflamed the passions of the already-excited Irishmen, and flaming posters were issued calling for meetings to protest against the "outrage."...Disturbances are again reported among the Russian university students at St. Petersburg....A London dispatch says the iron steamer Pallas, from Copenhagen for Amsterdam, is believed to have foundered off Heimskirk. Thirty persons perished.

To Pension Applicants.

The following circular, recently issued by the Commissioner of Pensions, explains itself:

DEP'T OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 20.

To Pension Claimants and their Attorneys:

To enable this office to dispatch with better facility the rapidly-increasing current business, a change in the system of arranging the records and files has been made which will render it necessary that all inquiries for the condition of pension claims on account of service rendered after March 4, 1861, should contain the name of the soldier who performed military service, with his State, company and regiment, as well as the number of claim or pension certificate, as the case may be. Inquiries which do not contain the above information will not be answered, except in special cases where the failure to furnish it is explained.

J. A. BENTLEY,
Commissioner of Pensions.

NEITHER Indian corn, nor potatoes, nor squashes, nor cabbage, nor turnips, were known in England till the opening of the tenth century. The peasants subsisted upon bread made of barley and ground in a hand-mill.

THE old artist at the Capitol in Washington, Signor Bramidi, has broken down from age, and his son will endeavor to complete the designs of the veteran fresco painter.

THE HOME DOCTOR.

TO RELIEVE CATARRH.

A writer in an exchange gives the following eight hints for relieving catarrh:

Inhale through the nostrils a strong solution of salt and water. I would advise as strong a solution as an ounce to the pint, though some will tolerate more.

In this strength it is not painful, but acts as a tonic and astringent, relieving congestion, and preventing the endosmose effect which would accompany the use of pure water or weaker solutions.

But it is a mistake to suppose that salt water will cure all cases of catarrh.

When the condition is one of chronic congestion simply, with acrid secretion, it may be sufficient; but in the worst forms, where there is a deep-seated inflammation with ulceration, more powerful astringent, as well as stimulant, and even escharotic solutions are requisite to effect a cure.

Inhale the smoke from pine tar. Get a pint or more of pure pine tar (not the oil) from a ship chandler; heat a poker red-hot, and stir the tar with it; a thick smoke will rise.

Hold your head over it, keep your mouth shut, and inhale through the nostrils; heat the poker three or four times, until the room is filled with smoke, shut doors and windows, and remain in the room as long as possible.

It is a good plan to smoke mullein in one's bedroom just before retiring; after smoking open a window from the top; the smoke slowly escapes, but enough remains to be of some benefit.

Mullein leaves should be thoroughly dried and then used the same as tobacco in a pipe.

The smoke should be pressed to the back of the mouth and exhaled through the nose; once or twice a week will suffice, and should be persevered in.

If properly cured there will not be an acrid exudation. A little piece of sponge in the bowl of the pipe will prevent the juice from passing into the mouth.

Mullein will be stronger gathered before the frost injures it, but will answer even if dug from under the snow. It will also be found an excellent remedy for cold in the head.

A HINT TO CONSUMPTIVES.

A correspondent of the Les Mondes calls attention to the fact that butchers, though they may be pale and thin when they enter on the business, quickly gain freshness of color, stoutness and a generally comfortable look. It is pure fiction, of course, that they put aside the best portions of the meat for themselves, and it is a known fact that most of them lose appetite. The correspondent attributes their general well being to assimilation, through their respiratory passages, of nutritive juices of the meat volatilized in the air—a kind of nutrition by effusion. If this be really a fact, it is argument that young people, suffering from deficient or impure blood, and especially children of a weak or lymphatic constitution, might be subjected with advantage to hygiene treatment based upon it. A well-known French physician commends the idea, and offers the following plan for the treatment of consumptive persons, in place of sending them off to distant places with reputedly mild climates: In a well-ventilated, sunlit and sheltered room, with southern exposure, he would, by means of a Monsseron brazier, the high moist heat of which is salutary and favorable to respiration, form for the patient an artificial climate, like that of Nice or Florida, having all the advantages, without the inconveniences, of the real climate. To aid the antiseptic action of the warm, moist air, rich in vapors, charged with dissolved carbonic acid, he would place in one or more corners of the room an open bottle of water saturated with sulphurous acid. By this arrangement he thinks the progress of the tuberculation would be arrested.

Unveiling of the Thomas Statue.

No more beautiful day could have been selected than the one on which the Society of the Army of the Cumberland, at Washington, Nov. 19, unveiled the noble monument to that eminent soldier, George H. Thomas. The crowd in attendance was very large, and large numbers of eminent civilians and soldiers were present to throw their flowers of respect and admiration upon the statue of a fearless and faithful commander. Every General officer in the army save three, was present. The statue is a noble one—an equestrian, by Ward. The President of the society, Gen. Sheridan, not being present, Gen. Jeff C. Davis, presided. The procession was formed on Pennsylvania avenue, near the Capitol, and started promptly at 1 o'clock. It was composed of five divisions, and was one hour in passing a given point. Gen. T. T. Crittenden was chief Marshal. The statue is located in the Circle formed by the intersection of some of the finest avenues of the city—Massachusetts and Vermont avenues and Fourteenth and M streets. Around the Circle were thirty-eight lofty poles, united by a rope of evergreens, each pole bearing an ensign and the coat-of-arms of a State and panel commemorating the battles in which the Army of the Cumberland was engaged, or the name of one of its deceased General officers. At each of the four corners of the pedestal upon which the statue stands there was a pole, corresponding with the poles representing the States, and flanked by stacks of muskets and field-pieces, the spaces intervening being ornamented with pyramids of cannon-balls. Here, also, a platform had been erected, capable of seating 1,500 persons. The platform for speakers was within this, and its panels were inscribed with the names of Anderson, Sherman, Buell, and Rosecrans.

Hon. Stanley Matthews delivered a masterly and eloquent address presenting the statue to the people of the United States, from the Army of the Cumberland, to which President Hayes responded as follows: "In the name of the people of the United States I accept this noble statue, so worthy of its subject, created in honor of Gen. George H. Thomas by his comrades of the illustrious Army of the Cumberland."

The exercises at the Circle occupied two hours. It is estimated that 50,000 people were in the throng that surrounded the inclosure. A general holiday was observed throughout the city, and the entire populace appeared to be in the streets.

In the evening speeches were made by Gens. Sherman, McDowell, Van Vliet, and Slocum, President Hayes and Secretaries McCrary and Devins.

The Waning Tramp.

One of the most noticeable features of the present general improvement in business and industry is the almost total disappearance of street mendicants from the highways and byways. The professional tramp also appears to be a thing of the past. He is well-nigh invisible. The Commissioners of Charity, moreover, have fewer applicants for relief than has been the case in many years, and at the police stations the testimony is uniform touching the rapid decrease of after-dark applicants for lodgings and food. These are important facts. The inference is that all classes of persons are now finding employment, and are in no further need of charity. All the leading manufacturing establishments in and about the city, it is well known, are increasing their hands, and some of them are running until late in the evening to complete orders. The tobacco factories, which employ great numbers of people of both sexes, are notably busy, as likewise the upholsterers, the plumbers, the cabinet-makers, the boot and shoe makers and the clothing manufacturers. It is a public and private blessing that everybody should thus be at work, and if the improvement can be maintained on its present basis we may look forward to a comfortable winter for the working people of every class.—New York letter.

Effect of a Lecture.

Miss Corson's lecture on cooking had a singular effect upon the wife of a gentleman residing in Washington. The gentleman was awakened from a sound sleep about 2 o'clock in the morning by a flood of gaslight in the chamber, coming from the jets in the chandelier, burning at full head. Standing over him, evidently in a somnambulistic state, and in a pose closely resembling that of the late Charlotte Cushman in the celebrated sleep-walking scene of Lady Macbeth, stood his wife, while in either hand, and ominously flashing in the gaslight, she grasped the mammoth carving knife and fork. Curious to know just what was going to be the denouement of this singular scene, he kept quiet, while the lady soliloquized: "Hold the carver in an easy position in the right hand, thus," and she dipped the point of the huge knife as gracefully as a fencing master in the broadsword exercise. "Then," continued the culinary student, "bend slightly the left wrist and insert the fork in the breast of the turkey, one prong on either side of the breast bone," and, suiting the action to the word, she was about to plunge the fork into her husband's anatomy, about where the ribs join the sternum, when he caught and disarmed her. She drew back and glared at him for a moment, and then, pushing back the sleeves of her robe de nuit, pointed her finger toward him and exclaimed, in a loud, theatrical manner: "The only way to reach your husband's heart is through his stomach!" Since that night this gentleman has slept in another apartment, with the door bolted and a stack of trunks piled up against it.

Department Estimates.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 19.

The printing of detailed estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, has been completed. The estimates of the amounts required for expenditure under the War Department aggregate $29,391,794 for the military establishment, and $7,557,834 for public works of various kinds, including about $5,000,000 for river and harbor improvements, $1,000,000 for sea-coast fortifications, $774,000 for buildings in and around Washington, and $637,000 for arsenal.

The cost of the naval establishment is estimated at $14,509,148.

The estimates for the Indian service foot up $4,992,846; for foreign intercourse, $1,185,135; for salaries and expenses of Collectors of Internal Revenue, $4,075,000; for expenses of the mints and assay offices, $1,209,810; for salaries and expenses of the Treasury Department proper, $2,661,672; for the Interior Department proper, $2,140,774; for deficit in postal revenues, $7,712,000; for construction of new light-houses, beacons, and flag signals, $674,000; for new Government buildings throughout the country, $2,247,000; for judicial salaries and expenses of courts, $3,250,000; for pensions, $32,044,000; for salaries and expenses of the two Houses of Congress (about), $2,800,000; for the salaries of President and Vice President and expenses of the Executive office, $97,464; for expenses of the tenth census, $2,750,000.

The grand aggregate of estimates is $136,347,120. The total amount appropriated by Congress for the current fiscal year was $162,404,848, which included $25,000,000 for arrears of pensions and about $3,000,000 for the District of Columbia.

AUBURN COURIER.

THEO. HERD, ROB. A. LOWRY } Editors.

The Russian Government proposes to establish a new official newspaper to influence public opinion.

Dr. H. J. Glenn, late Democratic candidate for Governor of California, has this year raised 65,000 tons of grain on his farm in Colusa county, worth $2,210,000. Some small compensation for defeat.

Albert Edward is desperately short again, and it is expected that an appropriation will be asked of Parliament at its next session to meet his pressing necessities. If he is as liberal with his own money as with that of the people, he will make the hoard of his economical mother look consumptive when it falls to him.

President Diaz, of Mexico, has caused circulars to be issued, directed to all Government employes throughout the republic, ordering them to abstain from all participation in the coming political campaign for the Presidency, under penalty of removal, and has recommended to members of the Cabinet the enforcement of this order in each department.

The liquor register, otherwise known as the Moffet bell-punch, has gone into operation in Texas, much to the disgust of the dealers in alcoholic beverages. The dealers have resolved to test the constitutionality of the law in the courts, but they have, nevertheless, taken advantage of it, both to raise the price of drinks and to refuse credit for them. The prohibitory sentiment, which is very strong in parts of Texas, favors the register, as tending to lessen the consumption of intoxicating drinks.

It was shown, at a recent Cabinet meeting in Washington, that Capt. Eads is not entitled to his quarterly payment on contract, because the requisite depth of water in his jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi river is not continuously maintained. A dispatch says that there is a determination on the part of the President and his Cabinet to hold Capt. Eads strictly to the letter of his contract, and there will be no deviation on account of the weather or because of high or low water.

Squaw Susan, who so heroically bent her energies to save the captive wife and daughter of murdered Agent Meeker, was herself once rescued from death in a romantic manner. Susan was captured by a band of Arapahoes, who put up a stake at the mouth of the Cache La Poudre, intending to burn her to death. The commanding officer at Fort Collins, having heard of the proposed barbarity, by alternate threats and promises obtained Susan's release. It probably was in remembrance of this that the squaw became so devoted to Mrs. and Miss Meeker.

An insurance decision of interest has been rendered in the United States Circuit Court at Pittsburgh in a suit to collect a policy of insurance issued by the Artisans' Insurance Company of Pittsburgh upon Gov. Washburn's mill property at Minneapolis, which was destroyed by fire and explosion in May, 1878. Payment was resisted on the ground that the destruction was caused by explosion alone, and not by fire, but the court ruled that where an explosive substance was ignited by fire and aided in the destruction, the damage must be considered to be caused by fire and the policy must be paid.

A shocking occurrence is reported from the little town of Genijesk, in the district of Melitopol, in South Russia. A number of persons dined at an eating-house where, among other articles, a species of white fish, salted and prepared like herrings, was spread. The consequences of the meal soon manifested themselves in an appalling fashion. Thirty persons who had eaten some of the fish died within an hour, after suffering excruciating torture. Eight peasants, three peasant women and three children, who had partaken of the fatal meal before quitting the town, were siezed on their way home with such atrocious pains that they lay down on the road and died. An official investigation has been ordered.

The death of Senator Chandler has brought to light another of those remarkable dream stories. Among the audience at his last speech in Chicago was Coroner Mann, who made an unsuccessful attempt at the close to get to the stand and shake hands with Mr. Chandler, failing in which he decided to call upon the Senator at his hotel in the morning. When the Coroner awoke in the morning it was from a dream in which he had seemed to be holding an inquest on the body of the Michigan Senator, with Editor Medill, of the Chicago Tribune, as one of the jury. Dismissing it as a bad dream, the Coroner after breakfast went around to the hotel, only to find that Mr. Chandler was dead, and to make the vision of the night reality by summoning Mr. Medil as one of the jury to sit upon his body.

The Czar of Russia is building a vessel of extraordinary form and dimensions, at Glasgow, Scotland, at a cost of $1,000,000. It is, ostensibly, intended for yachting purposes, but this is evidently a ruse, as, in the first place, it is intended for the Black sea, and in the next place, its build is anything but yacht-like. Briefly stated, it will be "a palace raised upon an enormous hollow steel turbot." The length is 230 and the breadth 158 feet, or more than three-fifths of the length. There will be three sets of engines, to work three screws of 10,500 horse-power; the speed is to be fourteen knots an hour. The depth in the center will be only eighteen feet; the depth of water six feet—except at the stern, where it is much more, in order to provide for the immersion of the screws. The bow will be beaked; the material is steel. It will have a large number of water-tight compartments. It looks very like a ram, with immense floating capacity.

The chief political and diplomatic event of the season in London occurred a few days ago at the Lord Mayor's banquet, in the speech by Beaconsfield in response to the toast to the health of her Majesty's Ministers. The recent marked revival in British commerce and industry furnished the Premier with an opportunity to felicitate the country upon a return of prosperity, and to give the solemn and oracular assurance that, in the opinion of her Majesty's Government, the revival was of a permanent and lasting character. He referred to the land troubles in Ireland in a rather flippant vein, sneering at the idea that a remedy of the evils complained of could be found in political agitation and social confusion, and giving the customary assurance of English sympathy, which is but another name for English indifference. On the subject of the peace of Europe Lord Beaconsfield spoke quite pointedly of Russia's disposition to resent British domination in European affairs, and intimated that a persistence in this line of policy would bring down upon Russia the united opposition of the great powers. He declared the belief that peace will be maintained for a long period, provided the power and advice of England are felt and heard in the councils of Europe.

A Pleasant Passenger.

It was a red-haired, gritty-complexioned man that got into a Pawtucket car while it was in waiting on the turn-out. With his long hair, capacious felt hat, and a beard like a burning bush, he resembled a returned Californian, and he probably was. There was an ominous silence when he took his seat, for somehow or other there was about the man an air of unusual and desperate business. There was a speck of blood on the ball of his full, hazel eye. He confronted the man opposite him and scrutinized him severely, and then in tones like a young cataract demanded:

"Ain't your name Archibald Cusk?"

"That it is, Captain," replied the man questioned, looking about him uneasily.

"I was sure on't," thundered the stranger, taking a canvas bag from one pocket and a revolver from the other, and placing one each side of him. "Eight years ago I got into this car with the inflammatory rheumatism in my right foot. I made a crotch-rest for it by laying my cane crosswise over my crutch. You came rushing into the car and kicked my foot without an apology. While I was wincing in hot-teared agony you said, 'Such a little jog might do me good; these little starts were very waking, and I looked like a man that wanted touching up and waking up a little.' Well, I must have looked stale and haggard. I hadn't slept an hour for four nights, and was trimmed down to ninety pounds or less, but that kick did wake me up, and I have been woke up ever since. I couldn't shoot ye before I went to the gold diggings, because I was too sick and too poor. I'm all fixed now, and here's the ready rhino to settle for it arter I put a lead pill into ye, and now, then, as it is me that has woke you up this time, I guess I'll reach out for old bull's-eye-bimmer and put you to sleep."

As the stranger reached for his revolver the man he had marked for immolation sprang to the car door, leaped to the sidewalk, and shot down the street.

"I hain't quite sartin," observed the stranger, "thet he is the chap that trod my foot, but I was sure that he had trod on some other feller's foot, and I kinder thought I'd better fix him for a starter till I struck my man."—Providence Journal.

Mrs. Margaret Robertson, of Cooper Angus, Scotland, died recently, aged 107. She lived under three British Kings and one Queen. She talked with scorn of poor creatures who could not live over 80 or 90, which she declared to Sir Henty Thompson, the surgeon, was "nae age at a'." The clay pipe was always in her mouth. "I've smoked a' my days," she said. "It's had plenty of time to dae me ill, and it's never specht."

Prospecting in the gold region of Georgia continues with unabated ardor. Practical miners are constantly arriving, and the Flat Woods have grown into a miniature Black Hills.

FARM NOTES.

Wheat is king.

Keep sweet potatoes dry and in a uniform temperature above freezing.

The tobacco crop of the Connecticut valley is reported greater than in any year since 1864.

It is said that very fine coal ashes mixed with linseed oil make a very fair cheap paint.

Mr. Meehan remarks that if the seed of cabbage be sown as soon as ripe, or at that time of year when it naturally ripens, instead of plants, making solid heads, they will bolt and run to seed.

The American Miller says: "There is no such thing as the shifting of the wheat belt, only in so far as the exhaustion of the soil renders such a shifting a necessity. Any acre of land will raise wheat forever if its capabilities are not taxed too much."

W. A. Armstrong says: "I have used a fence of three wires as a line fence between two pastures, cattle and horses running on each side, with great satisfaction and with the least possible amount of trouble and repairs. The barbed wire has solved the question of fence for the West."

A farmer in Bangor, Me., noticing that wheat was being picked from the heads of standing grain, and finding flocks of yellow birds flying about, shot some of them. On opening their crops, he found only three grains of wheat, and, by actual count, 350 weevils. It is better that farmers know whether they kill friends or foes.

It is mentioned as a result of the agricultural depression in England that 830 acres of freehold land were recently sold in Berkshire for $33,500. The rent of the farm was formerly $2,750, out of which $1,250 had to be paid in tithes and land tax. For the last three years the rent has been only $1,250, leaving the landlord only $350 over tithes and tax.

A Potato Contest.—The New England Farmer tells of a potato contest instigated by the members of the Franklin Farmers' Club of Massachusetts. The contest was confined to one square rod of ground, and the competitor who should win was entitled to the product of all the other competing rods. Competitors were required to plant from the same lot of seed, the Early Rose being selected as the sort to be planted. Of the eleven competitors, Mr. A. W. Cheever, the agricultural editor of the good journal from which we make these notes, produced the largest yield. The land on which he grew the trial lot had been under cultivation several years, chiefly under forage crops. Soil, a heavy loam, quite moist early in the season. It was plowed but once this year, a light coating of stable manure being turned in about seven inches deep. Rows were marked out about eighteen inches apart. Before planting, about 800 pounds of guano and 400 pounds of sulphate of potash per acre, were spread broadcast over the furrows. The seed was exposed several days to a strong light to start the sprouts into a short, healthy growth. When ready to plant, single eyes were cut from the potatoes, selecting only those which were well started and of good strong appearance. Most of the eyes were cut from the stem end or middle of the potato, where a good bit of the potato could be taken out with each eye. Then they were laid in a basket, with plaster dusted over them, to cover the cut surface and give protection to the sprouts while being handled. The pieces were dropped singly, about fourteen inches apart. The sets were covered not over an inch deep. When the shoots broke through, the plot was dusted over with guano at the rate of 200 pounds per acre, and raked into the soil with a garden rake, killing at the same time all the small weeds which had started. As the potatoes were so near the surface, and so thickly planted, it was found impracticable to hill them in the ordinary way, so the ground was mulched with chopped straw for a protection, not only against weeds, but to keep the new potatoes from being sunburnt as they showed themselves above the surface. The mulch also, in a measure, secured a cool, moist soil during the hot, dry weather of midsummer. The straw was put on some three inches deep, but soon settled to one inch, and was then covered with a second coat of mulch which remained undisturbed till digging time. To keep the bugs in check, a sprinkling of dry plaster was used three or four times, with just enough of Paris green to shade the plaster, giving it a slight greenish tinge. A very few weeds were pulled by hand during the season of growth, but it was the aim to travel over the patch just as little as possible, as the plants covered nearly the whole surface. The yield per rod was 183 pounds, equal to a yield of 488 bushels per acre. The most important lesson which Mr. Cheever learned by the experiment is that potatoes must have room to grow under ground, or the yield will be diminished and the quality impaired. He would never plant so near the surface again, and with an equally favorable season should expect to do better another year.

Remarkable Sagacity of a Goat.

A remarkable instance of the sagacity of a goat occurred recently at the residence of Peter Killean, No. 358 Dryades street. The participants in the event about to be related were a goat, which for some years past has been a great pet with the children of the family, and a pup, a comparatively recent arrival in the domestic circle. The goat and dog were on the best of terms, and had come to enjoy occasional rambles together around the yard during the goat's spare moments, when there were no oyster cans, door scrapers, or other edibles for it to dispose of. The singular behavior of the goat during the afternoon, some days since, attracted the attention of the family. It ran to and fro, crying in the most piteous manner, and seemed half distracted. Some one at last suggested that the animal should be followed, and it, seeming to appreciate the fact that it had been understood, led the way to the rear of the yard, where its canine companion was found in the vault, almost in its last struggles. The puppy was quickly rescued and restored to the goat, who greeted it with the fondest caresses.—New Orleans Times.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

Baked Tomatoes.—Take off stalks, cut in thick; slices add pepper, salt, and butter; put in deep baking dish; cover with bread crumbs and a little oiled butter; bake half an hour.

White Mountain Cake.—One pound of flour, one of sugar, and a half a cup of butter; six eggs beaten separately, one cup of sweet milk, a teaspoonful of soda, and two teaspoonfuls of cream tartar. Flavor to the taste, and use fruit if desired.

Rice Griddle Cakes.—One cup cold boiled rice, one pint flour, one teaspoonful salt, two eggs beaten very light, milk to make a tolerably thick batter. Beat all together well, and bake.

Chicken Dressed with Tomatoes.—Fry the chicken a light brown, put it into a dish; then pour into the pan in which it was fried one quart of boiling water, one onion chopped fine with parsley, four tomatoes a little stewed, one table spoonful of butter rolled in one table spoonful of flour. Let it stew for fifteen minutes, and then pour it upon the fried chicken, and serve. This recipe is for two large chickens.

To Renovate a Black Chip Hat.—Add to one pint cold water teaspoonful spirits of ammonia; use with a soft tooth or nail-brush; when clean, rinse with cold water and place in sun to dry. Do not soak or scrub sufficiently to destroy the shape. It will look as good as new.

Beefsteak with Tomato Sauce.—Take one and a half dozen ripe tomatoes; skin and scald them; put them in a saucepan, with one-half pint of good beef gravy; season with salt and pepper, and put them to stew for one hour. When the steak is nicely broiled, pour this sauce upon it, and send it to the table.

To Destroy Angle-Worms.—Angle-worms at the root of plants can be made to come to the surface by inserting a fine hair-pin or darning-needle into the mold, and then pouring lime-water upon the soil. This will be found to be good for the health of the plants also, and will keep the foliage fresh and green. Apply once a week.

Wheat Bread.—Boil or bake three potatoes and mash fine. Soak a yeast-cake and add to the potatoes when cool enough. Add two teaspoonfuls of salt; let it stand three or four hours; then add water enough for two loaves of bread. Stir in flour until very stiff; let it stand over night. In the morning add half a teaspoonful of soda dissolved in water, and butter the size of a walnut. Knead thoroughly, and then let it raise very light, and put in bread-pans without farther kneading. Let it raise quickly to twice its bulk when put in the pans.

Potato Yeast.—Boil six good-sized potatoes in two quarts of water till done; then take four table-spoonfuls of flour and two of sugar, and work them together with the potatoes and a little of the water until perfectly smooth, taking care to keep the remainder of the water on the stove until needed; when sufficiently mashed, add the rest of the water, and, after stirring together, put through a colander to prevent any lumps in the yeast; when about lukewarm, add a little stock yeast, and set in a warm place for about half a day, and it will be sufficiently raised to put in cans or jars in a cool place.

Standing Armies of Europe.

There can be little question that the present condition of continental trade is in great measure due to the enormous burdens laid on the people by the military policy of their rulers. How heavy these burdens are some details taken from a report lately issued by the Hungarian Ministry will show. According to this report (the object of which is to exhibit the relative weakness of the Austro-Hungarian forces and advocate an addition to them), the military strength of Russia consists of 3,046,800 men, of whom 600,000 belong to the reserve and 2,446,800 to the standing army. The regular army of France comprises 1,689,000 soldiers of all arms, the territorial army 1,208,000; total, 2,289,000, to be increased in 1892 by the addition of 300,000 reserve men to 2,723,000. The German power of all classes is represented by 2,004,300 men, of whom 1,076,200 belong to the standing army, 307,200 to the landwehr, and 620,900 to the reserve. Italy has an army of 698,000, and a militia of 310,000. In 1892, when the reserve will number 1,016,200, her total strength will reach 2,024,200. Austro-Hungary possesses a standing army of 800,000, a landwehr of 299,318, and a reserve of 95,000 men; total, 1,194,318. The grand total of all these forces amounts to 16,471,918, the standing armies alone numbering 7,925,000. But it must not be understood that all the latter are now under arms; at least half of them are on furlough. They form the first line, and all would, of course, be at once called out in the event of a general war. It is nevertheless true that the great military powers have at their disposal 16,000,000 men, who have learned, or are now learning, the soldier's art, and are bound to re-enter the ranks when required. The mind refuses to grasp the full significance of these portentous figures; but it may safely be affirmed that, so long as these bloated armaments are suffered to exist, Europe can count neither on lasting commercial prosperity nor on a long continuance of peace.—Geneva Cor. of Manchester Examiner.

What's in a Word Anyhow!

The examination of candidates for teachers' positions in our public schools sometimes develops some amusing and ingenious answers to the conundrums propounded by the Board of Examiners. A few days ago a young lady submitted her paper in word analysis, which contained the following definitions: "Autonomy" was defined as "the religion of the automaton.s" "Bestial," as "excellence, or that which is best." "Optimist," as "one versed in the science of the eyes."—San Francisco Chronicle.

THE BABIES.

A Funny Speech by Mark Twain.

Samuel L. Clemens, otherwise Mark Twain, was a guest at the Army of the Tennessee banquet in Chicago, and in response to the novel toast, "The Babies," delivered the following speech, which was received with roars of laughter:

"The Babies." As they comfort us in our sorrows, let us not forget them in our festivities.

I like that! We haven't all had the good fortune to be ladies; we haven't all been generals, or poets, or statesmen; but when the toast works down to the "Babies" we stand on common ground, for we've all been there—been babies. It is a shame that, for a thousand years, the world's banquets have utterly ignored the baby, as if he didn't amount to anything. If you gentlemen will stop and think a minute—if you will go back fifty or a hundred years, to your early married life—and recontemplate your first baby, you will remember that he amounted to a good deal, and even something over. You soldiers all know that when that little fellow arrived at family headquarters you had to hand in your resignation. He took entire command. You became his lackey, his mere body-servant, and you had to stand around, too. He was not a commander who made allowances for time, distance, weather, or anything else—you had to execute his order whether it was possible or not.

And there was only one form of marching in his manual of tactics, and that was the double-quick. He treated you with every sort of insolence and disrespect, and the bravest of you didn't dare to say a word. You could face the death-storm of Donelson and Vicksburg, and give back blow for blow—but when he clawed your whiskers, and pulled your hair, and twisted your nose, you had to take it! When the thunders of war were sounding in your ears, you set your face toward the batteries, and advanced with steady tread; but when he turned on the terrors of his war-whoops, you advanced in the other direction—mighty glad of the chance, too. When he called for soothing sirup, did you venture to throw out any side remarks about certain services being unbecoming an officer and a gentleman? No! You got up and got it. If he ordered his pop-bottle, and it wasn't warm, did you talk back? Not you! You went to work and warmed it. You even descended so far in your menial office as to take a suck at that warm, insipid stuff yourself, to see if it was right—three parts water to one of milk, a touch of sugar to modify the colic, and a drop of peppermint to kill those immortal hiccoughs. I can taste it yet.

And how many things you learned, as you went along. Sentimental young folk still take stock in the beautiful old saying that when the baby smiles in his sleep it is because the angels are whispering to him. Very pretty, but "too thin." Simply wind on the stomach, my friends! If the baby proposed to take a walk at his usual hour—half past 2 in the morning—didn't you rise up promptly and remark, with a mental addition which wouldn't improve a Sunday-school book much, that that was the very thing you were about to propose yourself? Oh, you were under good discipline! And, as you went fluttering up and down the room in your "undress uniform," you not only prattled undignified baby-talk, but you tuned up your martial voice and tried to sing, "Rock-a-by, baby, in the tree-top," for instance. What a spectacle for an Army of the Tennessee! And what an affliction for the neighbors, too; for it isn't everybody within a mile around that likes military music at 3 in the morning. And when you had been keeping this sort of thing up two or three hours, and your little velvet-head intimated that nothing suited him like exercise and noise—"go on"—what did you do? You simply went on, till you dropped in the last ditch. The idea that a baby doesn't amount to anything! Why, one baby is just a house and a front yard full by itself; one baby can furnish more business than you and your whole Interior Department can attend to; he is enterprising, irrepressible, brim full of lawless activities; do what you please, you can't make him stay on the reservation. Sufficient unto the day is one baby. As long as you are in your right mind, don't you ever pray for twins. Twins amount to a permanent riot, and there ain't any real difference between triplets and an insurrection. Yes, it was high time for a toast-master to recognize the importance of the "Babies." Think what is in store for the present crop. Fifty years hence we shall all be dead—I trust—and then this flag, if it still survive—and let us hope it may—will be floating over a republic numbering more than 200,000,000 souls, according to the settled laws of our increase; our present schooner of state will have grown into a political leviathan—a Great Eastern—and the cradled babies of to-day will be on deck. Let them be well trained, for we are going to leave a big contract on their hands. Among the 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 of cradles now rocking in the land are some which this nation would preserve for ages as sacred things if we could know which they are. In one of these cradles the unconscious Farragut of the future is at this moment teething—think of it!—and putting in a world of dead earnest, inarticulated, but perfectly-justifiable profanity over it, too; in another, the future renowned astronomer is blinking at the shining milky way with but a languid interest, poor little chap, and wondering what has become of that other one they call the wet nurse; in another, the future great historian is lying—and doubtless he will continue to "lie" till his earthly mission is ended; in another, the future President is busying himself with no profounder problem of state than what the mischief has become of his hair so early, and in a mighty array of other cradles there are now some 60,000 future office-seekers getting ready to furnish him occasion to grapple with that same old problem a second time; and in still one more cradle, somewhere under the flag, the future illustrious Commander-in-chief of the American armies is so little burdened with his approaching grandeurs and responsibilities as to be giving his whole strategic mind at this moment to trying to find out some way to get his own big toe into his mouth—an achievement which—meaning no disrespect—the illustrious guest of this evening also turned his attention to some fifty-six years ago. And, if the child is but the prophecy of the man, there are but few who will doubt but that he succeeded.

The Tardy Foot of Justice.

Among the curiosities of crime, the Chingford murder—now no longer a mystery—will deserve hereafter a conspicuous place. Although the foul deed was done twenty-two years ago, it was only yesterday that its perpetrator had his guilt brought home to him. Jonathan Gaydon, who has been sentenced to death for the murder of Miss White, an inmate in the house of her brother-in-law, Mr. Small, a farmer, at Chingford, on the 21st of June, 1857, has not escaped punishment for these twenty years or more, though he managed to baffle the law during that time. From the day when he butchered his victim and plundered the house in which she was left alone, one quiet summer Sabbath morning in 1857, he has wandered upon the face of the earth a conscience-stricken vagabond with the brand of Cain, not perhaps visibly imprinted on his forehead, but assuredly ever burning itself into his heart. This miserable wretch has been constantly haunted by the shadow of his horrid deed, and his self-torture at last drove him to give himself up to justice in a mood so desperate that in his confession to the police he said: "If I could have got a rope strong enough, I should have hanged myself to-day." But for his own confession and the fitting in of his story with the facts of the case, there was no evidence against the unhappy man; and his advocate made a futile attempt to convince the jury that he was not Jonathan Gaydon at all, but some morbid-minded, crazy creature, who, out of a demented love of criminal notoriety, was personating the murderer. The man's tale, however, so painfully circumstantial, his demeanor so terribly earnest, and the utter failure of his counsel to prove that he was somebody else than Jonathan Gaydon, left the jury no other alternative than to convict the prisoner. Barbarous as was his deed, there must have been some latent good in this wretched outcast. He had a conscience, at any rate, for it has been the means of bringing him to the gallows.—London Telegraph.

A MOUNTAIN EPISODE.

The Desperate Encounter Between Mr. Tom Short and a Wild-Cat.

[From the Eureka (Nev.) Leader.]

Mr. Tom Short, a well-known cattle man of Ruby valley, who for a number of years has furnished fine beeves to Eureka butchers, the fore part of last week had an encounter with a large wild-cat which came near resulting fatally to Tom. It appears that Mr. Short had set out early in the morning on the trail and hunt of a couple of strayed steers, and was alone, with the exception of his two dogs. He was leisurely riding along a rough mountain road, his dogs a little in advance, and as they came to an abrupt turn in the trail the dogs were lost to sight. In a few minutes Tom heard them yelping and barking, and at once knew they had attacked some wild animal. Putting spurs to his horse he was only a few seconds in turning the break in the path and coming to the scene of action. The two dogs had attacked a wild-cat, one of the largest of its species, and were getting terribly worsted. Mr. Short saw how the fight was going, and, not caring to lose his valued dogs, he sprung from his horse, drew his revolver and rushed to the aid of his canines. He had not much more than left the saddle, and was watching for a chance to shoot without hitting the dogs, when the wild-cat saw him, settled on his haunches, and then made a spring, striking Tom in the breast, knocking the pistol out of his hand, and carrying him to the ground. This would undoubtedly have been the last of Mr. Short had not fortune favored him. Just before the attack he had also drawn a knife, and while losing his revolver he clung to this, and as the cat bore him to the ground he made a desperate thrust, and most fortunately the blade touched a vital spot and the brute rolled over dead. Tom lay in an exhausted and almost senseless condition, but only for a short time, and as a couple of men happened along and, seeing the horse without a rider, immediately sought the cause, found Mr. Short and conveyed him to a ranch and dispatched a messenger to Elko for a doctor. Mr. Short was terribly cut up about the face, neck and arms, and has been unable to be about but little. We are pleased to say, however, that no permanent injury will be sustained. The wild-cat was one of the largest and most ferocious of its kind, weighing nearly 200 pounds.

What Stanley is Doing.

All alike will be interested in the following extract of a letter which has been received from Mr. Stanley, the famous African explorer, by an intimate friend. The letter is dated from Banana point, at the mouth of the Congo river, Sept. 13, and says: "All this year I have been very busy, and have worked hard. I have equipped one expedition on the East coast; have reconstructed another—namely, the International—of whose misfortunes we have heard so often, and have explored personally several new districts on the East coast. Having finished my work satisfactorily to myself, my friends and those who sent me, I came through the Mediterranean and round to this spot, where I arrived two years and four months ago, on that glorious day on which we sighted old ocean after our rash descent of the Livingstone. * * * And now I begin another mission seriously and deliberately, with a grand object in view. I am charged to open and to keep open, if possible—all such districts as I may explore for the commercial world. This mission is supported by a philanthropic society which numbers high-minded men of several nations. It is not a religious society, but my instructions are entirely of that spirit. No violence must be used, and wherever rejected the mission must withdraw to seek another field. We have abundant means, and therefore we are to purchase the very atmosphere, if any demands be made upon us, rather than violently oppose them. In fact, we must freely buy of all and every, rather than resent, and you know the sailor's commandment—'Obey orders if it breaks owners'—is easier to keep than to stand upon one's rights. This is the principle which I have always attempted to follow, but frequently the demands were so extortionate that they exceeded the value of my property. However, this time a chief must have a large mouth indeed that cannot be filled with good things. A year's trial will demonstrate whether progress can be made and tolerance granted under this new system. In some regions experience tells me the plan may work wonders. God grant it success everywhere! I have fifteen Europeans and about 200 natives with me. It is too early yet to say much of them; but most of the natives seem not worth their rations. However, patience! We shall see what time will make of us all, and how it will mold us all anew for the good work." Who is there in Great Britain that will not wish well to this new enterprise, which thus peacefully seeks to reap for commerce and civilization the fruit of the splendid discoveries effected in Central Africa by this illustrious traveler?—London Telegraph.

Probably Bismarck and the Duke of Wellington have had more orders and decorations than any others in the world. The latter rarely wore any, save the garter, and it was observed, when he lent a famous decoration for some private theatricals at Lady Salisbury's years after it was conferred, that the case had never been opened. Bismarck is quite as indifferent.

The negro exodus from Texas to Kansas is more than counterbalanced by the grasshopper exodus from Kansas to Texas.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, NOV. 27, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY
EDITORS.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS;
Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

"NO SOLID SOUTH, NO SOLID NORTH, BUT A SOLID UNION."

Yazoo county, Miss., the same Yazoo that radical editors talk about so much, elected a colored democrat to the legislature.

Gen. Grant's next trip will be to the West Indies and Mexico. He leaves New York on the 27th of December, in the steamer City of Alexandria.

Let the niggers come; every nigger that comes into the state will cause two white republican laborers to vote the democratic ticket. Let them come.

Can Hendricks carry New York?—Ft. Wayne Sentinel.

His friends think he can; will some lukewarm democratic editor of Indiana tell why he can't?

The total cost of the Thomas statue, recently unveiled in Washington City, including the cost of the pedestal, is $59,524,28 of which amount the sculptor Mr. Ward, received $25,000.

If there is any doubt about Hendricks being able to carry New York, the democrats of that state will certainly say so. Indiana democrats will do well to look after their own interests, and not persist in giving away the main chance.

On the 1st of next month the state of Indiana will issue $200,000 of 5 per cent. five year bonds, which have already been negotiated at a premium of 2 per cent. Will our republican cotemporaries be kind enough to name a republican state with as good credit as that of democratic Indiana?

General M. D. Manson, the present auditor of state, is the candidate for governor of Indiana, in the next campaign, of three-fourths of the voters of the state, regardless of party views.—Crawfordsville Star.

Has Crawfordsville another candidate for auditor of state?

The independent republican committee of the state of New York, has published an address to the independent republicans of that state, in which the committee acknowledges that had it not been for the 75,000 votes cast for John Kelley, Cornell, the republican candidate for governor would have been beaten 30,000 votes.

The report of the Secretary of War shows that the army now numbers 2,187 officers and 24,262 men, besides 388 officers on the retired list, or less than 10 men to each officer. Notwithstanding the surplus of officers headed by a general, a lieutenant general, and a score or more of major and brigadier generals, a bill has been prepared and will be presented as soon as congress meets, to create a new office and make Grant "captain general" to rank above all, during life. Is there anything else that could be done for Grant? Why not give him a deed for all the property in the United States, deliver the inhabitants into bondage and be done with it?

On this 27th day of November, 1879, —a day of national thanksgiving; a day set apart for returning thanks for the preservation of a free government; a day on which a free people are asked to bow before the Almighty in thankfulness for the return of prosperity, peace and happiness; on this day, in the midst of reverence and gratitude, when every American heart should swell with patriotism, and every lover of free institutions rejoice and be glad, behold what mockery, what hypocrisy on the part of the traitor element secretly praying for imperialism, and which has no sympathy for dying laws. The shadow of an empire is plainly visible, and as the horizon of a free government darkens in the distance, those who advocate an empire begin to speak in unmistaken language. The dictator plot thickens from week to week while free Americans stand by and witness the daring insult in wonder and amazement. The stalwart republicans of the north and representatives of the fire-eaters of the south unite in favor of Grant as dictator. The republican governor of Pennsylvania boldly proclaims his position, and is indorsed by the stalwart press, while a prominent southerner sounds the key note as follows:

"The north has changed from turret to foundation stone our old form of government, and it now wants that change ratified by making the appearance harmonize with the fact. The north wants a grand Union, with power centralized at Washington. We will give the north and take to ourselves a grand nation, with the power of an Empire centralized at Washington. The north wants a dictator, a strong man elected for life, to regulate and control this national government, with its power at Washington. We will elect Grant president for life, and for these reasons: As long as the substance is gone there is no use clinging to an empty shell, especially when, by abandoning the old, rotten hulk for the new craft, we have a chance of bettering ourselves. This waving of the bloody-shirt, these continued assaults and insults upon us originate in a desire to gain votes at the north. If the object is gained for which the votes are sought there will no longer be reason for aggression. The republican party will be satisfied, and we shall be left alone to build up our shattered fortunes in peace. There will be a poetical justice in this, all this, that in itself is tempting to us of the south. We shall see that in the brutal war waged on us to free the negroes those people have enslaved themselves, and we are a mighty factor in the ugly results.

"This, you will say, is the lowest form of egotism; but you must remember, my dear friend, we are not soiling our patriotism, for we are not allowed to have any. We are not sacrificing any right or any freedom, for we have none to sacrifice. We are, as the case stands, a conquered people, without hope, home or manhood; and we not only, like the blind Sampson, pull the temple down, but we rise, unlike Sampson, unhurt above the ruins." We would be better pleased to have a better instrument, but we must remember that to have a better man is to have no instrument. It takes a coarse brute to serve such a purpose. 'Revolutions, my dear, are not made out of gentlemen,' said that French woman of the court, when a lady friend complained to her of the low sort of men the revolt had brought into power. I shall advocate the re-election of Grant as long as he lives, and his son Fred. after his death, if I live that long."

The advance guard of the colored colonists with which the republican party propose to flood Indiana previous to the next campaign, arrived at Greencastle, Putnam county, last week. The number now in that county is about 50, and the negroes say there is about 10,000 more to follow. A newspaper reporter had the following interview with one of the darkies, which explains itself:

"Where do your people come from?"

"From Green and 'Jinin counties, North Carolina, boss."

"How many of you are there?"

"Fifty-one, boss."

"Any women along with you?"

"Only two."

"You are all young men, I see.'

"Yes, sah. De ole men didn't want for to come."

"Are many of you married?'

"Oh, Yes, nearly all of us is marr'ed. We's gwine to send or go back for our families as soon as we gets fixed."

"Have you got a place yet?'

"Yes. Me and my pardner that (pointing to a negro by his side) went out to Mr O'Hare's (a republican) last night, and he engaged us to work for him.'

"Any more of the boys got work?'

"I thinks me and my pardner am de only ones what have got places yet.'

"How much wages do you get.'

"Dat's not fixed yet. We's gwine to see fust if we suits Mr. O'Hare, and if he suits us.'

"How did you happen to come to Indiana? I should have thought you would have gone to Kansas.'

"Oh, we didn't like de way Kansas was rep'sented to us. We sent our men out here to see how it was here.'

"Did you get any circulars about this country?'

"I heered some talk about circ'lars, but I seed none of 'em.'

"What wages did they promise you?

"Well, dey said wages was $12, $15 and $20 a month.'

"Do any of you expect to work in town?'

"No; we's all field hands, and will have to go to de country.'

"Who is getting these places for you?'

"De boss of de em'grashn (emigration) society. I seed him a little while ago. He's got an office 'round heah somewhere!'

"Is his name Langsdale?'

"Yes; dat's de man.'

"Did the emigration society induce you to leave North Carolina and come here?'

"Well, I 'specs it did. De men we sent out heah to see about it told us to come, and we come.'

"When did you start?'

"Last Sunday night.'

"Did you have to pay anything on the cars?'

"No. It was kind 'o like an excursion. Dey told us to put our stuff on and come 'long.'

"Did you stop anywhere on the way?'

"Yes. We stopped at Washington a few days.'

"Did they treat you well there?'

"Yes siree, boss. 'Peared like dey couldn't do enough for us. Dey took us all over de city to see de sights and gave us plenty to eat.'

"Did you go up to see Hayes and the rest of them?'

"Oh, yes. We seed 'em all,' with a chuckle.

"You had plenty to eat on the way?'

"Yes, we had enough grub."

"I understand that it won't cost you anything to go back after your families?'

"No. We gets passed back free.'

"How does that happen?'

"Don't know. Em'grashun society fixed it, I 'spec.'

"You look pretty chilly. Do you think you can stand the cold weater up here?'

"We's brave men, we is, and I guess we can stand it. Hab to hab somethin' warmer dan dese ole clothes, dough'

"Are there any more down there who would be willing to come up here?'

"Lord bress you, boss, dere's about ten thousand dat will come."

The manipulator of the colonization scheme appears to be George J. Langsdale, postmaster at Greencastle, and editor of the republican organ of the county, but of course it is not his money that is doing the business. The exodus was no doubt conceived in solemn republican caucus, and the funds are furnished by the republican national committee. The damnable plot to overcome the democratic majority in Indiana by importing lazy, good-for-nothing negro paupers into the state to increase crime, and reduce the wages of white laborers to a starvation point, will meet with opposition from the laboring people before it goes much farther; in fact it is understood that the trades union organizations have already threatened resistance to the attempt to rob their members of their hard-earned savings. The taxpayers of the state will object to being taxed to clothe and feed several thousand indolent scalawags during the winter months. The sensible people of all parties will vote against such outrageous proceedings on the part of republican leaders, and the state will give an increased democratic majority.

A Surprise Party.

Some time since, a very highly prized bird dog belonging to Sheriff Leas, strayed or was stolen from the owner. A few days later the dog was recovered by Cook Ford, and kept secreted until last Friday evening, when a number of our sportsmen considered it an opportune time to present the dog to the owner, accompanied by a complete outfit for hunting purposes, in view of the sheriff's recent association with the amateur shooting club of this place. Doctor Ford was selected to deliver the presentation speech, and Tom Bell had the honor of delivering the valuable presents which had previously been placed in his charge. At the appointed time the following celebrated marksmen assembled at Ford's livery office, viz: Doctor Ford, Frank Ryan, H. C. Peterson, Tom Bell, J. H. Ford, A. W. Allen and Cook Ford, and being informed that Messrs. R. D. Tefft, S. C. Swineford, County Commissioner Duncan, County Surveyor Van Auken and Deputy Sheriff Sommers had captured Sheriff Leas and had him under guard at his office, the party first named joined the captors, and the spokesman proceeded to surprise (?) the sheriff by presenting him with a dorg, of great working capacity (at the kitchen door) from the kennel of a celebrated English breeder, and well trained to set (a bone) as long as any dorg. The sheriff was evidently glad to see the dog, and if the words written upon the card attached to the dog's collar expressed the dog's feelings, he was evidently glad to see the sheriff. Upon examination of the card we found the following greeting:

"I'M YOUR DORG,
YOUR BOON COMPANION, YOUR LOVING PROTECTOR
AND GUARDIAN."

The meeting was affecting indeed, but the sheriff soon rallied sufficiently to realize the benefits to be derived from the gun which Doctor Ford was in the act of presenting, with a history of its great antiquity and services during the revolutionary and subsequent wars. The explanatory and precautionary remarks offered by the doctor were highly appreciated by the sheriff, inasmuch as the gun is constructed on the rebounding principle. Mr. Swineford was willing to testify to the identity of the gun with the exception of the lock, stock, barrel and ramrod, the remaining part being more in the line of his observation. Being aware of the sheriff's anxiety to visit the Kankakee, the donors considered it necessary that he should be provided with a pair of highwater rubber boots, which were procured with considerable difficulty, owing to the large size required (fourteens). The boots are well preserved, considering the time they have been in use, having been first broken in by Noah during the freshet which occurred during the lifetime of that memorable gentleman. Having been provided with a dog, gun and boots, a game bag and dog whistle were considered indispensable, and those articles were secured without regard to price. The game-bag is made of imitation coffee-sack, handsomely ornamented, and has a capacity sufficient for at least one day's shooting. The dog-whistle is made after the most approved pattern, with telescope end, and tinplate extension, and when placed near the dog's ear is certain to have his attention. It is also provided with a soup-bone attachment, the sound of which is well understood by the sheriff's dog. The outfit, as a whole, is considered the finest in the state, and was received by the sheriff in profound silence, overcome with emotion. He finally recovered sufficiently to promise a share of his time to field sport, and after returning thanks to his friends for the valuable (?) presents, ordered the cigars for the crowd.

EDITORS COURIER:—In the secretary's report of the proceedings of the last three days of teachers' institute, as published in the COURIER last week, the secretary says: "Percentage by C M. Merica, as he teaches it with his class of 10 previously trained pupils." Now, I desire to correct the above statement, as but four of the pupils of that "trained" class attended my school this fall; all the rest, except James Hogue, were strangers to me. If by "previously trained" the honorable secretary meant that the members of that class were drilled for that occasion, he—well, to use a mild term, he was badly mistaken. I do not consider those from my school any better trained on percentage than on other subjects in practical arithmetic, but I exerted every effort to have my pupils "trained" on all subjects, so that when called upon at any time they can do themselves honor. As to the other members of the class, by their work, I considered them also well trained, so that the gentleman might have had reason to assert that they were a "previously trained class," yet it seems to me that a person of his pretended qualifications ought never make an assertion upon a mere supposition, as he is very likely to make a misrepresentation.

I did not know whom I was calling into my class, except the four spoken of above, and they, with the exception of one, were not aware that I intended to call upon them until their numbers were called for the recitation.

The following motto is worth remembering: "Speak only what you know to be true, and you will avoid many a censure."

EDITORS COURIER:

—In publishing the item concerning Mr. Krider's golden wedding, I see several misprints, which you will please correct in this issue. After marriage they lived but 8 years in Maryland; you have it 18. The tobacco donation should be one half pound, instead of twelve pounds.

—Frank Teeters can build a number one straw stack, if he does go to high-school in Auburn. For proof see Elson's barn-yard.

—The commissioners are putting up a fine truss bridge across the creek at the corners. Mr. H. Griswold has the contract, and will complete the bridge in a few days.

—Hank went back on our school. Mr. Foltz of Auburn, is teaching it now. Look out Hank; you may get bit in your trade yet.

RURAL.

—In Blackwood's Magazine for Nov., republished by the Leonard Scott Publishing Co., 41 Barclay street, N. Y., we find the following:

"Reata; or, What's in a Name." Part VIII. The first chapter is headed "A Broken Heart," but it seems more like "a heart sorely wounded but of great recuperative power."

"An American Princess." This article, beginning with a reference to the ups and downs in the lives of the Bonapartes, is a review of the "Life and Letters of Madame Bonaparte."

"Whig Reviewers as Painted by Themselves." A history of the early struggles of the Edinburgh Review, called forth by the "Correspondence of the late Macvey Napier," who succeeded Jeffrey as its editor, and retained that position for eighteen years.

"Syria—The Maronites."

"A Poor Devil." Last scenes in the life of an old actor.

"Among the Affghans" is a sequel to a paper published in Blackwood in May giving an account of the clans who live more in the interior of the country than those formerly described.

I have just received a hundred more shot-guns, of all kinds, which will be sold at cost price for the next thirty days, at prices ranging from $2 25 up to $100; also a full and entirely new line of revolvers, pocket-knives, razors, scissors, ammunition, etc. etc. A chance never offered before.

—Fred. Yesbera again visited his old home, West-Unity, O., last week. He says she—that is, his old home—is just as dear to him as ever, and this of course accounts for his frequent anxiety to see her—his old home, of course.

—Young fellow, if you want to "make a mash" on that dear young lady friend, come to the COURIER office and get her a pack of elegant visiting cards for a holiday present; then if she doesn't come to time, we'll eat a raw saw-buck.

—The Fort Wayne Sentinel is responsible for the statement that, while attending the Pinafore performance recently, a fellow who had never seen it before said he "thought it was all right, but that old 'hardly ever' gag ought to be left out."

—Mr. Cook Ford has traded his livery barn, horses, harness and carriages to Mr. A. W. Allen for 50 acres of land east of town. We wish Mr. Allen success in his new undertaking, and predict that Mr. Ford will make a first-class granger.

—A. S. Leas took possession of his former livery stand in this place, on Monday, by an arrangement and settlement with Mr. Kingsley. He will at once fit up the concern in his usual first class style, and be prepared to accommodate his friends. "The boys" rededicated the office on Monday evening. —Waterloo Press.

—Our young wagon and carriage painter, Ora Shaffer, was a passenger on the ill-fated B. & O. train which was ditched near Bremen last Saturday. He says it was the first smash-up he ever participated in, and in future he doesn't care to be counted in.

—On the 1st of December, 1879, we will increase the price of elm and red-oak stave bolts 25 cents per cord, making elm $2.25 and red oak $2.75. No chance in the price of other timber. We want all the elm bolts that can be had, the more the better.

C. BEUGNOT & Co.

—Our jolly old friend, Bill Walter, who represents the wholesale house of Fred Walter, at Mansfield, Ohio, called to see us on Monday last. Our long acquaintance with both of the gentlemen named, enables us to assure dealers in their line of goods that all orders will be filled exactly according to contract.

—We received an invitation to attend a lecture on physiology, delivered yesterday morning at Fort Wayne, in the college building, by Dr. T. J. Dills, brother of our townsman, W. H. Dills. It would have been a pleasure to attend but, "owing to circumstances over which we had no control," 'twas impossible.

—Louis Ridenaur, the man who suddenly went crazy while serving as a juror in the Swain murder trial at Ft. Wayne, and who was conveyed shortly afterward to the insane asylum, died at the latter place on Thursday last. He resided near Monroeville and was regarded by his neighbors as an honest and upright man.

—From Dave Snyder we learn that a gentleman named Ira Barnes, of Albion, Pa., is about to put up machinery here for the manufacture of wooden handles. Negotiations will be made for a building 20x80 feet at once, and the machinery will soon follow. This is no "Allen" business, but straight goods, and we are glad to know it.

—W. J. Austin presents every married man around his establishment with a big fat turkey every thanksgiving; and we can't understand why Alva Potter didn't "catch on" with his girl last night.

—Geo. Hazzard, with whom some of our people are slightly acquainted, has been adjudged insane at Chicago. We have always thought something ailed George, and now we know it, since a court of justice has pronounced him crazy as a bed bug.

—"He said damme," he did, and we think he meant it, because he started down Penfield & Emanuel's stairway, during the hail storm yesterday, and got to his destination six minutes ahead of time, wrong side up.

—Mr. Isaac Hague called Rev. H. J. Norris into his (Hague's) shoe store one day last week, and very slyly presented him with a pair of elegant shoes. Isaac was anxious to keep the matter quiet so that it would not be mentioned in our local items, but it leaked out, as generous acts always do.

—Wm. Stevens, of Ft. Wayne, is now in town offering territory for the sale of a patent burglar-proof lock, which, in our judgment, is the best thing of the kind we have ever examined; and we see no reason why an active man could not make a big thing out of it, wherever he might attempt it.

—The grocery and provision business of Mr. Frank A. Hoff is increasing so rapidly that he is compelled to have more room. He has rented the room now occupied by Stimley's saloon, on Eighth street, and intends connecting it with the room he now occupies, so that his store will front on both Seventh and Eighth streets.

—Mr. E. Berry had the misfortune yesterday, at about 8 o'clock in the afternoon, to lose seventy dollars in bills—one fifty and one twenty—which he had just received for a car-load of coal. He is of course exerting himself to find it, and we hope he may succeed, as that amount isn't found growing on every bush these days.

—Garrett intends to hold up her end in the life-partnership business, as will be seen by the following list of smitten ones who will give thanks to-day, at that place, by tieing up in the bonds of pad-lock: Joseph Cour and Sadie Duffey, Josiah Dibert and Estella Farnsworth, John Adams and Jennie Conners. Now, what'll they all be doing next Thanksgiving?

—The new Lagrange Democrat, under the editorship of J. Frank Synder, bids fair to become a shining light in that county, despite the premature cackling of a few envious republican cotemporaries; and we trust that number two of volume two, one year hence, will belie their prophecies and show the Democrat to be what Mr. Snyder can doubtless make it—a prosperous and influential democratic newspaper.

A RIDDLED RAIL,

Which Dumps a Train into the Ditch.

A smash-up occurred on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, at about two o'clock last Saturday morning, which, taking everything into consideration, was attended with miraculous results. The east-bound passenger train, consisting of a baggage and express car, smoking car and two coaches, was flying along at the rate of about thirty miles an hour, trying to make up some fifteen minutes which they were behind, as we are informed, and when at a point three miles this side of Bremen, Ind., or about fifty-two west of Auburn, the entire train was thrown off the track, with the exception of the rear car—a sleeper. A brakeman who lives at Fostoria, and who was seated in the smoking-car, had two ribs broken and was for a time pretty securely wedged in between two seats, but was finally extricated and drawn through a window by the frightened passengers; he is now at Garrett, and it is thought that he will survive his injuries. One other gentleman, a passenger living at Napanee, who was also sitting in the smoking-car, was at first thought to be seriously hurt, but it has since been ascertained that his injuries are not at all dangerous, though located internally. No other persons were hurt, so far as we can learn, but how the engineer and fireman escaped with their lives is a matter of no little mystery. The engine was separated from the tender and turned completely over, while the smoker was demolished and one end of the passenger coach mashed in.

The accident is said to have been caused by a patched rail, which it is supposed had been displaced a few hours previous by the westward-bound train. The road on this divison is reported to be sadly in need of repairs, and we have no doubt but that the officers of the B. & O. road will now have the line carefully examined, in order to avert the recurrence of a similar catastrophe. Taken all in all, it is simply marvelous that there was not any loss of life, and those who were on board can congratulate themselves at not being somewhere in the regions of eternity.

Slightly Off.

Some deluded individual at Waterloo, corresponding with the Fort Wayne Sentinel of Tuesday, and who was either drunk or disorderly, says: "Waterloo, at the junction of the Ft. Wayne, Jackson & Saginaw and the Baltimore & Ohio railroads, is a lively little business town," etc. Rip Van Winkle said, upon being told that he had been dead twenty years, "If Rip Van Winkle is dead, and this is me what is here, then who the devil am I?" And so, in this case, we are forced to suspend the rules of the Sunday-school long enough to remark, If Waterloo is located at the junction of the above-named roads, then where the devil is Auburn?

"It Busted."

Last Saturday, at about noon, Jim McDowell was out in the backwoods with a single-barreled shot-gun. His object in thus arming himself was to murder the first rabbit that had sand enough to cross his pathway. He spied one and blazed away, since which eventful period in James' career nothing has been seen of the gun, the rabbit or Jim's third finger. He is a young man of about 18 years, and doubtless could have used that finger to wear a ring on for some years; but he offers no reward, as he thinks it has gone forever. The gun went off and the finger went off simultaneously, and so did the rabbit; then James picked up what was left of himself and went off too. And further the deponent saith not.

The Festive Hazzard.

[Ft. Wayne Sentinel, Tuesday.]

S. M. Hench will go to Angola next week to assist in the prosecution of Hazzard, the bank defaulter, etc. Yesterday Hazzard had a number of parties arrested at Auburn for assault and battery with intent to kill, and dragged them to Logansport for trial. The assault consisted in the simple use of force at the time of his arrest. Hazzard's a daisy.

Yes, but he's a crazy "daisy," according to the reports in Chicago papers of Tuesday, which state that he got into a big row, was arrested, and has been adjudged insane. Georgie's career has been a checkered one, and he is doubtless convinced of the truth embodied in the biblical assertion that "the way of the transgressor is hard."

The 44th Indiana.

Dr. J. H. Rerick, editor of the La-Grange Standard, informs us that he has concluded to comply with a request made at the re-union of the 44th Reg't Ind. V. I., held at Auburn in September last, that he prepare and publish a history of that regiment, which will contain a full and complete review of all the marches, battles, and encampments of the regiment as well as a personal record of each member. The doctor went into camp with the first volunteers of the regiment an remained with the command intil it was mustered out, and now has at his command the official records, so that he is enabled to give every detail concerning the service of the regiment. The history will not be published as a source of profit, but as the doctor puts it, "more for love than money." The book will be handsomely printed and bound, and every surviving member and their friends should have a copy of the work, to be handed down from generation to generation in remembrance of the patriotic soldiers who risked their lives in defense of their country. Surviving members of the regiment will confer a favor by sending their postoffice address to Dr. J. H. Rerick, LaGrange, Indiana.

The Republicans have claimed the righ to use Marshals at elections—Marshals all fo one side, a horde of unnecessary electioneer paid out of the common treasury. There wer 750 of these Marshals in the Eastern district o Pennsylvania, not because any Republican vot was in danger, but because it was the aim t influence this Congressional district, and, than God! they got a rebuke that they won't forg in an increased Democratic majority. Repub lican extravagance was extended further tha the public treasury. Between the close of th war and the advent of a Democratic House o Representatives the Republicans gave away no less than 130,000,000 acres of the public domain. Why, the thirteen colonies had only 218,000,000 acres. Think of it! Territor equal in extent to four States of the size of Ne York presented to six corporations! The resul is that any of you who may be disposed to tak Horace Greeley's advice and go West will hav to buy your land from corporations, payin them $10 an acre for ground that might be ha for $1.50 an acre but for the extravagance an injustice of the Republican party.

The Truthful Test.

It requires no learned experts to establish the fact that Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is the purest and the strongest. If it will make sweeter, lighter, and more digestible bread, biscuits, cakes, etc., than can be made with other kinds, it is an incontestable proof of its purity and greater excellence.

Dr. Price has prepared a rich variety of perfumes, from which the most fastidious can select an odor with agreeable satisfaction. Dr. Price's Pet Rose, Alista Bouquet, and other perfumes, are great favorites, as their sweetness and freshness are so decided.

Life Insurance Record.

The official returns for the year 1879, show that the Union Central Life Insurance Company of Cincinnati secured the largest amount of new business in the state of Ohio, which amounted to 500 new policies, covering $1,243,302.00 of insurance. The liberality and strict business principles upon which this large financial institution is conducted is undoubtedly the main cause of its success. Mr. Thos H. THANKSGIVING.

PARAPHRASE OF THE ONE HUNDREDTH PSALM.

In songs of grateful praise and joy,
Angels and men their tongues employ
With sweet accord
To praise the Lord.

Above the clouds, upon His throne,
Surmounting worlds to us unknown,
He made the earth,
And gave us birth.

As faithful watch the shepherds keep,
Over their well-beloved sheep,
He will be nigh,
And hear our cry.

He will supply our every need,
And lead us where our soul shall feed
In pastures green,
Though now unseen.

For earth has sweet and flowery fields,
But heaven a richer herbage yields
Beyond the skies,
In Paradise.

Then let us to His house repair,
Bowing in adoration there,
Our tribute bring
To Zion's King.

The everlasting love we claim,
Vouchsafed for all mankind the same
In aeon past,
With truth shall last.

THE WINTER LILY.

A Story of Thanksgiving.

BY ETTIE ROGERS.

"Thanksgiving eve!"

A clear, beautiful night, with the least touch of frost in the delicious air, and a brilliant indigo sky, thickly studded with stars, like sparks of flame.

In a small, neat room on the uppermost floor of a six-story tenement, a pale, gentle young lady stood at the one window thoughtfully watching the motion and glitter in the street below.

On a couch on the other side of the apartment lay a weak-faced, middle-aged woman, evidently ill, or, what is worse, thought herself so. And in truth Mrs. Maria Carll was one of those dependent, clinging, unambitious creatures whom the world pities sometimes, and despises always. She had been reared in that unenviable grade of society known as "genteel poverty"—that peculiar, superficial class whose heads and hearts are as empty as their stomachs, and whose gilded idleness is poorly suggestive of "Solomon's lilies," inasmuch as neither one nor the other toils nor spins. At 20 she had sold herself to a rich old husband, whose childless widow she had been for years. Mrs. Carll, who could not make her own caps any more than she could earn them, and who could not tell a mortgage from a love letter, woke up one fatal morning and found herself as poor as she had been in the days of her girlhood. She felt that the only role of life left her was that of "interesting invalid in reduced circumstances," and she assumed it accordingly.

"It was a crushing blow, my dear Mrs. Grundy, I assure you, and I shall never recover from it—never," she was wont to say, pathetically, behind her handkerchief of worn and ancient lace.

On this Thanksgiving eve she awoke from a prolonged slumber, and saw her niece, Linnie, standing, pale and pensive, beside the window, blurred by the delicate frost-tracery of the early night.

"Have you made up your mind yet, Linnie?" she inquired, fretfully.

"I—I have not, aunty," faltered the young girl, sighing as she turned from the window and paused before a large glass vase, in which a magnificent Spanish lily had just burst into bloom. For Linnie, those green, rich leaves and the odor of the creamy flower aroused the memory of a love sweeter than life and enduring as immortality itself.

It was on one delicious April morning that Erle Warford brought her the young bulb with its green leaf-points just breaking through the sand and water of the crystal jar, and bade her tend it carefully in memory of him. They were not quite so poor then as they were now. They had pretty rooms, and she had plenty of work coloring photographs in a dingy pretension of a studio, where she sang all day long and dreamed happy dreams of her lover and her future when she should be his wife.

It was spring then, and the days were long and warm, and she was satisfied with life and all it might bring, despite the peevish and eternal repinings of her burdensome relative.

It was winter now, and the days were brief and dark, with storm and trouble. She had no work, and the last penny of her earnings was gone. All her handsome dresses and precious trinkets were in the pawn-shop. The last coal was dying out in the grate, and the last crumbs in the cupboard would not have fed "the one sparrow for whom God careth."

Of Erle Warford she had not heard since the day on which he had brought her the souvenir flower. He might be untrue, or he might be dead, or the haughty and eccentric old grandfather might have cajoled him into some loveless, selfish marriage.

"Don't be uneasy about the future, little one," Erle had said at parting. "The old gentleman has never refused me anything, and he will not oppose me seriously in such a momentous matter as marriage. Before this lily flowers you shall be my wife, and he will be quite as proud and fond of you as he is indulgent to me."

But that was very long ago; and, as she thought of the inexplicable absence and silence of months, a big tear like a diamond dewdrop fell and flashed into the heart of the blossom.

She had another suitor now—a wooer old and odd and rich and persistent.

"You are a sensible young woman, Miss Linnie," he said one day, and therefore I think not pleased with pretty speeches. On withered lips ardent love is a burlesque; beside our aristocracy does not believe in any emotion whatever. Passion is ignored by the ton—a marriage of affection is ridiculous.

Linnie looked at him curiously. Was he satirical, diplomatic or simply verbose? What did the queer twinkle mean in his jolly blue eyes? He went on:

"I need a wife. I have chosen a lady who is young, good-looking, dutiful, and would make my home pleasant. The day that she becomes my wife I shall settle upon her, unconditionally, one-half my fortune. What do you say, Linnie?"

"I?" faltered the girl, pink from the bands of her dark hair to the ruffle of the simple tulle that circled her pretty throat.

"I have chosen you, Miss Linnie," was the business-like rejoinder.

"You wish to buy me?" she inquired, paling with sudden anger.

Mr Gilmour laughed in his jolly fashion, being neither hurt nor offended.

"It is the mode now-a-days for hearts to be bought and sold. Is there one pure and perfect love-marriage in a century, my girl? I should be kind to you always, Linnie. In our case there should be no pretty pathetic romance of the icicle freezing the rose and all that sort of nonsense. Think it over—think it over, child. I will speak to your aunt, and you can decide—to-morrow evening, if not too soon."

And the hour had come and her decision was not made, and her aunt was furious.

"You have not made up your mind yet, you say?—and Mr. Gilmour expected an answer immediately. I suppose you mean to refuse him," quavered Mrs. Carll, "and I must go on living this sort of life, starving and freezing, as long as I stay in this cold, ungrateful world, which won't be long. After all I have done for you, Linnie, how can you be so cruel—so positively wicked?"

"Don't, aunty," returned Linnie, faintly, her delicate form quivering as if from a blow, and another scalding tear dropped into the heart of the lily.

"You thankless and ungrateful creature," snapped Mrs. Carll. "Did I not take you when you were an orphaned, half-starved baby and bring you up as my own? Have I not clothed and educated you and given you a home?"

The beneficent woman uttered these questions glibly, as she ought, for she had asked them every day for the last twenty years.

Linnie was silent and her heart was bitter.

The most common servant would scarcely have cared for the sort of life Linnie had led with the capricious Mrs Carll.

Yet, like all noble souls, Linnie had exaggerated every deed of real kindness, and in her gratitude forgot the petty wrongs, the senseless tyranny, and the unjust burden of responsibility imposed upon her young life.

"What have I not done for you, Melinda? Are you deaf that you stand there like a stone idiot and never answer? Will you marry Mr. Gilmour, or will you refuse him and let your poor old sick aunt lie here and die of poverty and despair?"

And then the sobs began to come and she pleaded as only such a woman for such a cause can plead.

"Oh, be merciful, my dear child. It will save my life, and it will be a blessing to you. Mr. Gilmour is an exceptionally-fine man, and once his wife you would want for nothing."

And thus she persuaded and expostulated, until the girl almost yielded quite.

Surely Erle Warford has nothing to do in causing you to hesitate?"

"Everything," answered Linnie.

"Melinda, I am ashamed of you," cried her relative, roused into a fury of sham dismay. "Have you no self-respect that you still care for one who has treated you infamously?"

"He may be dead, aunty."

"Dead! What a silly lunatic you are, to be sure! Erle may have a rich grandfather, whom he will find it profitable to please in marrying. But it is profoundly evident to me that when the young man left you he did not intend to return. He is just the sort of man to amuse himself in a flirtation of this kind. For gracious' sake don't let Mr. Gilmour suspect anything of it."

The girl turned, her dark eyes afire and her delicate cheeks aflame.

"I shall tell Mr. Gilmour," she emphatically declared; "and then, if he still desires me for a wife, I will marry him."

She had scarcely uttered her sudden decision when her elderly suitor came.

The gentleman looked curiously doubtful and anxious. Perhaps his old heart was not an icicle after all!

"Then I can never hope that you will love me?" he observed, after listening to what Linnie had to tell him of Erle Warford.

She turned upon him her proud, still, white face.

Under that impassive mask she thought that to the day of her death she should carry a passion-haunted heart.

"Begging your pardon," she replied; "was not this to be a business transaction only?"

He smiled at the ready response.

"Which we must discuss and arrang in a sure and proper way," he said, and made his departure only half pleased.

Shortly after various and costly articles for a superb feast were sent up to the litte room.

"We shall have our Thanksgiving dinner," said Mrs. Carll, and that night her dreams were those of the gratified and self-satisfied.

Not so the young girl who lay by her side, for Linnie was wretchedly sleepless and remorsefully miserable, and all night through the dusk of the chamber her lily flower gleamed just as ghastly white as her own troubled face.

Thanksgiving morning! And the merry bells poured out their peals on the sweet, crisp air. Beautiful women in furs and velvets and diamonds passed by to the palaces of worship, or the mansions of feasting. And yet everywhere, even within the sound of those gleeful bells, thousands of hungry innocents shivered with cold, and thousands of homeless men and women could say with the persecuted One: "The foxes have holes, the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay His head."

I wonder if the world is ever as thankful for the good it has done as for the good it has received?

Linnie thought bitter things that morning. All her life long she had been hampered and fettered, and now she was the foot-ball of a destiny that it seemed impossible to avoid.

Much as she esteemed Mr. Gilmour, she shrank from such a soulless union with him as she would have done from any other thing that desecrates womanhood.

Cursed be the social wants that sin against the strength of youth!
Cursed be the social lies that warp us from the living truth!

Over and over again Linnie quoted this anathema from "Locksley Hall," marveling if ever she in the life to come should be strong and brave enough to "drag her memories."

The Thanksgiving feast, that she had scarcely tasted, was over, and her relative taking her siesta in an easy-chair, when Mr. Gilmour came. Linnie shivered as she saw him.

"My dear child, do you repent yet of your promise?" he asked her kindly.

"A promise is to me a sacred thing," she replied, evasively.

"Granted. But were Erle dear or still living?"

"He has broken his vows to me," was the laconic response.

"Perhaps not. Perhaps he is living, and is true. Perhaps he is on his way to you even now."

She struggled to her feet, and fixed her startled eyes upon his face.

"You have something to tell me," she cried. "What is it?"

For answer, the gentleman opened the door and admitted Erle Warford.

"I have brought my grandson to call upon you, Miss Linnie," he said.

But the girl heard nothing except her lover's fond and passionate words, and saw nothing but his dear face, so unchanged and true.

"You forget yourself, Melinda," observed Mrs. Carll, greatly shocked.

"You are mistaken," retorted Mr. Gilmour; "she forgot herself when she allowed you to direct her judgment and her heart. She would have gone to the altar like a lamb to the sacrifice, after you had convinced her it was her duty. You would have sold her to me that you might live in idleness and self-indulgence. Erle, don't be selfish; I want to have a word with the little one."

Linnie turned and put out both her pretty hands with a little gesture of coaxing depreciation.

"Forgive me, child," he began, before she could speak; "I was bitterly disappointed when Erle refused to marry a rich woman whom I had chosen for him. Finally I made conditions with him. He was to stay there, looking to my business, while I was to come here and see you. If you proved to be all he represented, I agreed to withdraw my objections. The boy believed you so true that no length of silent absence could make you forget or accept another, eh? But, my child, I never had a thought of allowing you to sacrifice yourself, and I am very fond and proud of you, my children."

So they were all happy except Mrs. Carll, who considered herself the most vastly abused of all womankind.

Mr. Gilmour was very generous to the young people, bestowing upon them jointly the half of his fine property.

"This is the happiest Thanksgiving of my life," said Linnie's handsome young lover, after they were all calm again. "And, by the way, I fancy this lovely lily kept back its blossom for my return. It should have bloomed weeks ago. Did it, too, with my love, whisper, 'I wait?' Was it a long waiting, dear?"

"Very long—very sorrowfully long," she returned; and a tear, for past unrest and present bliss, dropped again in the white heart of the Winter Lily.

FORGOTTEN CONGRESSMEN.

References to a Few Statesmen Who Have Sunk Into Oblivion.

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal.]

How ephemeral is political fame. Among the thousands who figured in their day as Senators and Representatives in Congress, the names of but few are familiar to the present generation. Clay, Webster, and Calhoun made an impress on the history of their country which, perhaps, will never be forgotten. The class of statesmen standing next to them in ability are even now almost faded out of the public mind. John Forsyth, of Georgia in profound silence, overcome emotion. He finally recovered ently to promise a share of his field sport, and after returning to his friends for the valuable (?) ents, ordered the cigars for the

CRASHING INTO AN ICEBERG.

Thrilling Scenes on a Steamship in Mid-Ocean.

The steamship Arizona, of the Guion Line, bound from New York for Liverpool, met with a frightful accident while crossing the northern edge of the Newfoundland banks, which is thus described by an eye-witness:

It was 9 o'clock in the evening. The ladies were gathered as usual in the saloon, and one of their number, Miss Gaslett, of England, was playing the accompaniment to a glee song—"See our oars with feathered spray"—which one of the gentlemen was singing. Without a moment's warning, and before any one could realize what had occurred, a terrible crash was heard. The hull of the steamer shook as though every rivet had burst asunder, and the ladies and gentlemen were hurled from their seats and sent sprawling on the floor. A spasm of terror seized on many of the ladies, but the majority displayed wonderful coolness and self-possession. One lady fainted, and others sobbed hysterically, but they were soon joined by husbands and friends, who, seizing cloaks and wraps, hurried their fair charges to the deck. Social Hall for a moment was the scene of even a worse panic. The nightly auction of pools on the next day's run had just concluded, and Mr. S. S. Ingham, Jr., who was acting Secretary, was in the act of receiving the purchasers' money. Before him, on a marble-top table, lay a quantity of gold and silver coins, when the ship went crashing headlong into the iceberg, and he was sent with the table and money sprawling on the floor. A dozen others were hurled from their seats, and those who remained on their feet made a wild rush to escape to the deck by the door. The prostrate were trampled on, and several received quite serious contusions. A sudden panic had seized upon the men who, a few moments before, had been engaged in friendly banter. Fortunately, a few retained their self-possession, and several voices cried out: "Steady, gentlemen; keep cool." This appeal to their manhood was effective, and the panic ceased almost as suddenly as it had begun.

The sight that met the passengers' eyes was well calculated to chill the bravest heart. Towering above the steamer's bows rose a huge iceberg, threatening her with instant destruction. Out of the submerged field rose three huge, cone-shaped masses, sixty or seventy feet into the air. There was danger that one of these would topple over and crush the ship into a shapeless mass. In the few moments which followed this discovery, men seemingly lived years of agony. The affrighted sailors of the watch fled behind the bridge, and, thinking only of their own safety, set to work to launch one of the boats. One of these men wept in abject terror; another spread dismay among the more-frightened passengers by stating that the ship was sinking rapidly. Unfortunately, appearances but too well justified his statement, for the steamer, on striking the iceberg, listed heavily to starboard and sunk visibly forward, creating the impression that she was settling at the bows, which, broken and twisted, no longer offered a barrier to the inrushing water, which rapidly filled the forepeak. Between the passengers and destruction there stood only the slight barrier formed by the collision bulwark; but at first it was impossible to tell whether it had not also been driven in. Should it prove so, all on board the Arizona were doomed to death. A hasty examination revealed the fact that the bulkhead had not given way and that the forehold was free from water. A boat was then lowered and the first officer proceeded to examine the breach in the bow. When he made his report it was announced that the ship would lay to for the night, and that in the morning measures would be taken to repair the damage. Subsequently, on consultation with Mr. Guion, one of the owners, who, with several members of his family, was on board, it was decided to make for St. John, Newfoundland, e nearest port of refuge. This news as joyfully received, as there was a rong impression that the ship had received more damage than the officers ere willing to admit.

As soon as the excitement had become somewhat allayed, the passengers sembled in the saloon, at the suggeson of the Rev. J. M. Ross, all knelt in ayer to return thanks for their deliverance from imminent death. All ned in the hymn, "Praise God from om all blessings flow," with a deep d earnest fervor. During the remainder of the night very few persons ned in, but kept watch in the saloon worn out by fatigue, they dropped eep on the seats.

The following morning the ship's w was turned toward St. John, ere she arrived at 10 o'clock in the evening, and laid up for repairs.

Lincoln and Stanton.

met Marshal Ward Lamon the er day, and, in speaking of the nton letters published in the North erican Review, Lincoln's friend and grapher told me of the manner in ich Lincoln happened to get Stanton into the Cabinet.

n December, 1861, which was only a months after the date of the Stanton letter, now published, Mr. Lincoln talking with Secretary Chase about action of our Government in the nt affair. The President was asking if the Secretary had heard of any nions as to the Government's course prominent Democrats, when Mr. se said he understood Mr. Stanton, o was then in Washington, shared opinion of the President and upd the Government's course.

The President then asked Mr. Chase he had ever heard how Mr. Stanton abused him—the President—in the McCormick case at Cincinnati. Mr. Chase replied that he had not, and the President told how Mr. Stanton, being retained on the same side as Mr. Lincoln, declined to consult with him, saying he would have nothing to do with the "long-legged and long-armed ape. But," said the President, as he concluded the story, "tell Mr. Stanton I would like to see him."

Within a few evening, Mr. Stanton called at the White House. The President told him he had heard that his visitor was upholding the legality and policy of the Government's course. Mr. Stanton replied at some length, giving his reasons for the opinion he held. The President asked him if he would commit it to writing. Stanton promised he would, and this interview ended without any other subject than the Trent affair being alluded to during the whole of the evening.

It was within one or two evenings afterward that Mr. Stanton called with the manuscript of his opinion as requested. As he handed it to the President, the latter said: "Mr. Stanton, there is about to be a change in my Cabinet. Will you take the place of Secretary of War?" Mr. Stanton was much surprised, but, before he left that evening, he had accepted the position, and during the next month, January, 1862, went into the office.—Washington letter.

Characteristics of Bayard Taylor.

Mr. Stedman, for years the friend of Taylor, writes as follows of him in a paper in Scribner, chiefly devoted to a critical analysis of his poetry and literary career:

His memory was prodigious. Nothing that he learned was forgotten, and he learned without effort. After a single reading he knew a poem by heart, and could repeat whole pages of his favorite authors; and there was little that he did not read or see. His perception of externals was alert and true; but he did not readily catch by intuition the thoughts and feelings of those about him. He had a fine sense of form and color, drew and painted creditably, and seemed a natural artist. His linguistic powers were well known. He taught himself something of the classical texts, and was more infused with the antique sentiment than many a learned Theban. He quickly caught the pass-words and phrases of any language, Semitic or Aryan, wherever he journeyed. German he mastered, wrote in, thought in; it became so much like a native tongue with him as to refute the theory that one gains of a new language only so much as he loses of his own. His desire for knowledge was constant, and his professional training made him rapidly acquainted with the meaning and scope of a new work or movement that came within his view.

His personal traits were no less admirable. To think of him is to recall a person larger in make and magnanimity than the common sort; a man of indescribable buoyancy, hopefulness, sweetness of temper, reverent, loyal, shrinking from contention, yet ready to do battle for a principle or in the just cause of a friend; a patriot and lover of his kind, stainless in morals, and of an honesty so pure and simple that he could not be surprised into an untruth or the commission of a mean and unworthy act. His open delight over any work of his own that pleased him was the reverse of egotism, yet often misunderstood by those who slightly knew him. He was without jealousy, though sometimes ruffled by the prosperity of quacks and pretenders, and took as much pleasure in the legitimate success of others as in his own. Yet his personal ambition and aspiration were very great, only equaled by his heroic industry and scrupulous fulfillment of the lightest or heaviest task he undertook.

In social life he was generous and unrestrained, full of the knightly, mirth-loving, romantic spirit; a poet who kept his heart green to the last, even when disease was upon him, and the plethoric habit of his middle life. These dulled his eye, but never broke his spirit or turned his thoughts to gall.

As a poet, we say, the qualities of his mature style were now fairly displayed. From the beginning, rhythm, the susurrus of liquid measures, had much to do with his sense of the beautiful in verse, and reacted upon his imagination. He reveled in the effect of the broad English vowels, the "hollow ae's and oe's," and in the consonantal vigor of our language. He enjoyed reading aloud the poetry of Darley, of Byron and Shelley, and read his own with such melody and resonance that one who listened to its chanting sound was no more able than himself to tell whether it was of his poorest or his best. Its dominant quality, therefore, was often that of eloquence, as in the verse of Croly and Campbell.

A Valuable Witness.

There had been great tribulation in a tenement house, on Battle row, in West Fortieth street, and Mrs. Kane had got a black eye and lost a couple of handfuls of hair through Mrs. Nolan's tender manipulation. At length the law was invoked, and to the Jefferson Market Police Court the belligerents went to demand that justice be meted out. There had been only a couple of witnesses examined when a little woman with a snap in her eyes elbowed her way up to the stand, put her arms akimbo, and with a defiant shake of the head faced the defendant, who was a perfect Amazon.

"What's your name?" his Honor asked.

"Bridget McShane, may it plaze yer 'Anner, and I'm not afraid to say it." This with another defiant dip of the bonnet.

"You want to testify?"

"I do, sir."

"Did you take part in this trouble?"

"I didn't, sir."

"Did you see it begin?

"I didn't, sir."

"Were you there while it was in progress?"

"Not I, sir."

"Nor when it ended?"

"Indade I wasn't."

"Well, what in the name of common sense brought you here if you know nothing about it?"

"'Twas that big huzzy there, sir," designating the defendant. "She sed there wasn't a woman in the house dare appear agen her. So I kem to show that Bridget McShane cares nothin' for her nor all her breed."

Any further testimony from so valuable a witness was dispensed with.—New York Herald.

THANKSGIVING HYMN.

BY MARY STANDISH ROBINSON.

We give Thee thanks, O God of law
That all thy power endureth still,
Above the change and fretting flaw
Of our poor, striving human will.
We thank Thee that Thy bonds are strong,
And compassed with a just design
About our lives; that we belong
Unto Thy providence benign.

We thank Thee that good men and true
Still live to prove Thy watchful care;
That Thy wise order doth renew
The race in virtue; that the share
Of sin and wrong doth not obtain
A final triumph o'er our trust;
That truth unsullied can retain
Our hopes, though prostrate in the dust.

We thank Thee that the way of pain
Doth open space for hearts to grow;
Cramped by the arbitrary reign
Of self, we can but feebly know
The woes of others, till our own
Make quick the sympathies that teach:
Thy love and pity, God, are shown
Toward us, yet how we fail in each.

In an uncertain, groping way
We reach, O Lord, out to the light
Of Thy great love; it surely may
Raise every drooping soul upright.
We trust and thank Thee, Lord Divine,
For all we cannot understand;
It is to us the potent sign
Of Thy omnipotent command.

SABBATH READING.

Prof. David Swing on the Idea of a Future Life.

Passing over to the Greek and Latin records, we find the quantity of written thought about a future life greatly increased. Homer, Pythagoras, Plato, Socrates, Pindar, Cicero, Virgil and a large group of allies combined to render immense the study of immortality. Any one of these writers will be found to express more regarding a second existence than may be found in that part of the Jewish record bound up in our Bible. But this results, as I believe, from the fact that the Jewish writers were all busy about the state, even the songs of Moses and David being state poems; while the classic writers had no subject assigned them, but they were always out in the wide domain of intellectual theory and adventure. The Hebrew literature is the picture of the human mind expressing itself upon all possible questions. To amazing genius and activity the classics added unrestrained liberty and wandered whither they would. They gave us prose and poetry, metaphysics and science, medicine and music, politics and geometry, geography and theology, while the Hebrews spoke and wrote only about their nation. Therefore in the Greek and Latin books the future existence covers the larger area with both principle and detail.

Homer doubtless embodied the common theology when, in his "Odyssey," he leads his hero through the spiritual world to meet the many noble ones who had fallen in battle, or in the embrace of common death. The scenery differs little from that in Dante. Homer wrote 800 years before Christ, and, as he was distant from David and Solomon only two centuries, it is quite probable that Hebrew and Egyptian and Greek were all in substantial harmony as to things beyond the grave. That Homer's poem was not simply pure fiction, and, as such, rejected by his age, we may infer from the fact that poets cannot move against the public impression; and from the additional fact that the grave and logical men who followed Homer in time repeated in philosophy what he had said in song. Pythagoras taught the migration of souls from one animal to another, and, to the end that men might lead holy lives and thus pass upward toward angels or to nobler forms of manhood, and not be ordered down toward brutes, he organized a form of church whose members, like the recluses of the old Catholic denomination, spent all these years purifying themselves that they might be found ready at death for a happy transmigration. The spectacle of many thousands following this Pythagoras—a thousand members of one brotherhood being on record—declares that these teachings were not simply poetic, but were the practical belief of a large multitude. Pindar, following at a distance of 100 years, leaves us a very formal and calm poem about the rewards and punishments beyond this probation:

> The deeds which sinful mortals do
> In this disordered part of Jove's domain
> All find their m ed, for there's a judge below,
> Whose doom inflicts inevitable pain.

* * * * * * *

Others pass:

> To realms of rest,
> Happy isle that holds the blest,
> Where seaborn breezes gently flow
> O'er blooms of gold that round them blow.

Pass along another hundred years, and the poet Calistratus shows that no great change has come in the public thought, for, in a hymn to a patriot who had rescued the land from conspirators, he declares that the honors which that patriot was receiving from men was only a type of the bliss he would enjoy in heaven among the immortals. When you have asked Plato and Socrates to this list of witnesses, you have a compendium of the Greek thought for perhaps 600 years, and in all that long period it varied but little. The poems of Virgil teach us that the Latin world was the regular successor to Greek theology, and thus step by step we come to the borders of our own Christian religion.

All nations and periods have their times of higher and lower faith. There is an ebb and flow of opinion just as of the sea, and coming from causes as full of mystery. If it be true, as alleged, that one of the ancients pined away and died of a broken heart because he could not learn what caused the tide to come and go every day and night upon the beach before his home, he was almost pardonable, for there is only one thing of the kind more perplexing, and that is the ebb and flow of faith upon this shore of mortality, where all our tents are pitched. How strange! In the morning, great, clear, bright waters come in, and the great ships that ply between two worlds sail up near our bank; and we can place our hand or foot in this flood of immortality. But the evening comes, and while in the darkness we steal a little rest the vast sea silently withdraws all its cheerful wave, and leaves us encamped upon a slimy gulf—all the colors, and perfume, and power, and solemn sound of yesterday having gone from us in our dream. So faith comes and goes, only with this painful difference, that the anxious heart must wait longer for the absent sea to come flowing back. The ocean can make its ebb and flow in a day, but this hope of the heart once gone, it may not come back in all the lifetime of him who saw it fade.

Doubtless just before Christ came a cold wind of unbelief had struck the public heart. As the Roman empire had gathered Greece, and Palestine, and the African coast all together under one flag with itself, and had thus spread one literature, or rather one ignorance, it is almost certain that the skepticism of the center, Rome, had become the doubt or negation of the civilized world. That there had come a waning of the idea of immortality in the central heart there is little doubt, and, as the heart sends its blood all through the system, so Rome must in times just before Christ have sung to all its colonies the song of an endless sleep. Not that all heard and accepted such a conclusion, but that so many did that the public rapidly sunk into vice, and awaited a new guide with new inspiration. In the last few generations of the old dynasty, and in the first few of the new era, before Christianity had become known or endured, the most of thought had become almost wholly that of the stoical school. It is not certain that such men as Cæsar and Cicero, and after them Seneca and Aurelius, had become perfectly convinced that there was nothing after death, but, very certainly, they all so taught at times and walked under the dark cloud of fate. Cicero, at times full of immortal yearnings, at times said that death was the end. In a letter to his wife he tells her that she will find her gods as false to her as men had been to him. Julius Cæsar feared the gods in this life, and all his superstitions revealed this world for its arena. When the question was before the Senate whether the Catiline rebels should be put to death or banished, he argued that death was no punishment, for it was a total release from all trouble.

Just after these great minds came Seneca, and Epictetus, and Aurelius, with morals the highest known to mankind except the morals of Christ, but all looking to the grave as the final termination of joy and grief. Seneca, in his large writings, and those writings being all concerned with character and its reward, has nothing about a life to come. Nor does Epictetus allude to a heaven or hell. And then comes Marcus Aurelius with all his patient submission to God, and with his awful loftiness and simplicity of life, and yet with his bosom full of the sentiment that death is a sleep that knows no waking forever. Indeed, he expresses gratitude to God that man has a grave to which he can fly should the storm of life become too violent. Self-control, and simplicity, and peace, and virtue were his doctrines. He calls anger, and passion, and sin a war with nature, and says that death brings a harmony by resolving us back to dust. "If," he teaches, "you cannot maintain a true and noble conduct with others, then go boldly into some corner where you can maintain them; or, if you fail there, depart from life at once, not with passion, but with modest liberty which will be to have done one noble act." Suicide was to this Roman a fortune to which the soul could resort when its other joys were gone. In this embodiment of the stoical philosophy no ripple of the immortal shore is to be heard.

While thus the Western nations were dealing with this theory of a future life the East was holding largely the pantheism of Buddha. Each created soul was like an isolated rain or dew drop, the affair of an hour, but very willing to be absorbed back into its old ocean. When rain-drops are placed near each other upon a leaf they are impatient to combine. So man away from his parent God is restless and unhappy and longs to be absorbed and lose in the Infinite his solitude. In Buddhism the millions look up and pray for the time to come when they may drop back into the Supreme Deity and rest forever a part of God. It seems a little better destiny than the suicide of the stoics, but as each is the death of the individual the two theories of man are not far apart. One fades into immensity, the other in a grave, but man is gone.

Looking into these Asiatic and Roman worlds, marking how dark the real death-bed of man was coming to be, it was high time for a new flow of faith. The Western world, destined by race, and by language, and by institutions to become so vast, was in danger of being wholly overcast by this night of death. The Roman genius was very powerful for good or ill. That iron ethics promulgated by Aurelius and his compeers was able to blight all the smiles of the human soul, and make men of marble rather than men and women of mingled virtue and joy. Or, flying from such severity, society would have become sensual to the last degree. No room is left for conjecture or prophecy here, for in those days when the empire was dissolving the Roman mind, which had once been so grand in learning, and culture, and taste, is seen all debased and ruined by practices of which the English tongue refuses to speak. Many had begun to say, "Let us seek pleasure, for to-morrow we die," and under this flag of license the crimes, and vices, and depravity of the Roman became such that they are literally in our purer tongue unspeakable.

At this critical period in the history of the idea of a second life there came in a mighty reinforcement. The troops of Life had been falling back. They had thrown away many a weapon, many a shield; flags once proud were trailing in the dust. The ranks of Death were becoming more unanimous and bolder. Those venerable leaders, Seneca and Aurelius, who had held the legions from rapine were now dead, and the soldiers of all vice and violence had only to march on and possess the land, the fireside, and the heart. In this crisis a mighty host of new troops came and the banner of a second life waved again in beauty. The individual was neither to be absorbed in deity nor in dust. A man, he was to be a distinct and human soul forever. All the moral and intellectual good of this experience was to attend each heart always, and death was to have no sting and the grave no victory. All virtue here was to be rewarded hereafter; one could not even give a suffering one a cup of water without thereby bringing one more approving smile from the King of Kings upon His throne. All sin would be punished by a God of equity as well as of love. The leader in this reviving faith was loftier than all who had gone before. To the sinking race He reached out His powerful hand, and the millions who under stoicism would have turned to stone, or under the reaction would have become only animal in mind and soul, began now to combine the highest duties and pleasures of this life with the higher calling of immortality.

Thus tacking to and fro, this thought has come to us over a wide expanse. It has not come never to meet with any vicissitude again, for all the sacred things man possesses are always full of threats that they will go away and leave us to taste, for a time, the desolation of an absence. But of all ideas of immortality this one in the heart of the world now will, no doubt, wander away the least and will the soonest return; but the grandest uprising of thought, the serenest sky for us all, will come when we shall have put aside the teachings of earthly history, and, transferred to the world of spirit, "our own eyes shall behold and not those of another," when, after the worms have destroyed the body, we shall, clothed in a new form, see God.

An interesting quarrel has arisen at Indianapolis between the Coroner and an undertaker as to the disposition of the body of a suicide, claimed by a medical college for dissection. The undertaker reports that the clamor for dead bodies is great, and at times nearly overwhelming, but he thinks he is justified in using every possible endeavor to find out the relatives.

The Supreme Court has rendered a decision upon an appeal favorable to the notorious Whistling law of the last Legislature. The old English axiom that "the King can do no wrong" is in this decision applied to the Indiana Legislature, the court holding substantially that, although the continuous whistling of locomotives might, under ordinary circumstances, be a nuisance, when it is done by virtue of the act of the General Assembly no nuisance is committed in the eye of the law, and that the law cannot, therefore, be set aside upon that ground.

"Worried," or "Married."

A careless telegrapher, of New York, caused a panic recently in a domestic circle of that city. A young woman telegraphed from Philadelphia to her mother in this wise: "Have received no letter. Am worried." The message received by her mother was: "Have received no letter. Am married." The mother was surprised at this sudden announcement, and she gave the daughter a large piece of her mind. The operator had mistaken "worried" for "married," no doubt thinking the meaning was the same, and had wired the mother the surprising intelligence.

The will of the late Bishop Whittingham, of Baltimore, is in his own handwriting, and opens as follows: "In the name of God, Amen! To the Holy, Blessed and Glorious Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, be adoration, thanks, and everlasting praise!" The Bishop's estate consists almost solely of a large and very valuable library, which is distributed among several religious societies.

Jo Cook on Bob Ingersoll: "His lack of religion sufficiently illustrates his lack of sense." Bob Ingersoll on Jo Cook: "His philosophy is the theology of New England, seasoned with poor German thought—that is to say, he mixes saur kraut with his beans."

POLITICAL DISCUSSION.

Some Recent Public Utterances of Prominent Democrats.

Gov. Seymour on Harmony in the Party.—In the course of my long political experience I have seen and felt so much of the evils which men bring upon themselves by discord, that I cannot refrain from warning you, to whom I am under so many and great obligations, against dissensions in your own ranks. Men are apt to think that the results of an election chiefly affect candidates for high offices. This is a great error. They fall upon the mass of voters in a tenfold greater degree than upon those who are called 'leading men.' As a rule, these are advanced in life. In a little while they will pass away. Personal controversies among the young and active may live for many years, to harm and embarrass them. It may be in the power of men to gratify some passing prejudice or interest by defeating those of their own political faith, but it never fails, in the course of time, that such things come back to harm and plague those who indulge personal prejudices. New York is by right, by tradition, by interest, a Democratic State. This county, in its better days, upheld the principles of Jefferson and Jackson. A majority of the citizens of Utica hold to the same faith. If the young and active members of our party will be true to themselves they will recover that power which justly belongs to them. If they allow themselves to fall into dissensions they will destroy their own heritage, and when it is too late will regret their folly. I am now an old man, and so far withdrawn from active life that I don't think I am governed in my views by mere partisan prejudice. I feel deeply my obligations to my political friends, and I hold my principles as sacred because I believe them best fitted to promote the welfare of my country. Yet I respect the earnestness and sincerity of those to whom I am politically opposed. It is uncertain if I shall ever again stand before an audience in Utica to speak about public affairs. I wish, therefore, in the light of a life-long experience, to say that I believe parties are necessary for the preservation of our form of government, for the education of our people in political truths, and for liberalizing and enlarging their minds. We hear a great deal of cant about the corruption in politics.

There are no corruptions in public affairs which are not generated and nourished by other influences at work among the people as a people. All efforts, all zeal for a cause, if it is a worthy one, tend to lift men above mere personal objects, and by exertions for others and by dwelling upon considerations outside of themselves, tend to make men better and more generous. We have selfish men in our public life, but they were not made selfish in their positions, for these, dealing with general interests, tend to liberalize men's purposes. There are corrupt men and bad men in parties, but they have been made corrupt and self-minded in other relationships of life than those which grow out of their association with others in the promotion of a common cause. There are many ignorant men to be found in all political organizations, but they are not so ignorant as they would have been if there were no public discussion of matters which concern the public welfare. As a rule, those who clamor against selfishness of parties are those too selfish to perform the duties of citizenship. Those who shake their heads at corruption are noted for their greed of gold, gained by speculative schemes, and who mourn over the cost of carrying out their own corrupt measures. I have been an actor in public affairs during a period of great bitterness and excitement in the minds of the American people. I have felt more than most men the warmth and kindness of party support, and I have felt, too, the sharp and angry criticisms of opponents excited by passions and prejudice. I must in fairness say that those opponents most active and earnest in their zeal for their parties have been in the end more ready to do justice than men who satisfy themselves that they are right, and that all who differ from them are wantonly wrong, and who are too selfish to learn in the sharp conflict of parties that there are two sides to all questions, and that honest differences of opinion should always be respected by honest men. I am a believer in zeal, even in those who hold views in conflict with my own, for I never yet knew an active, honest man, whatever his errors may be at the outset, who did not in the end become a useful, just and liberal member of society.

Speaker Randall on National and Local Debts.—Now let me show you what is expected from taxing the people in this country. The Federal debt exceeds $2,000,000,000, the State debts amount to $400,000,000, and the city and county debts are beyond $1,000,000,000. Of this enormous city and county debt Philadelphia has a very large part. Here is $3,500,000,000 upon which the people must pay interest. You thus see the importance of compelling public servants to pay not a dollar unless there is absolute necessity for doing so. The tendency of the Republican party has been toward extravagance ever since I last had the honor to represent you in a public capacity. Figures prove this beyond all controversy. We are led by history to believe that there are two great dangers to a republic—taxation and a tendency to grasp power unduly. The Republican party has moved in the direct way of centralizing the Government—that is its tendency to-day—in opposition to the rights of the people. We have seen now the power of the army has been used. The Republican party, by sending soldiers to intimidate voters, has given expression to its policy of keeping in force in time of peace the laws that authorized the sending of an army into certain States in time of war. Not only in distant and adjoining States has this policy been enforced, but in this very district the use of the marines has been witnessed. Yes, and at one of my elections I was sorrow-stricken to see that the votes of freemen had to be given under the point of the bayonet. We triumphed, but we should bear in mind that there are not many districts like this. The Republicans have claimed the right to use Marshals at elections—Marshals all for one side, a horde of unnecessary electioneers paid out of the common treasury. There were 750 of these Marshals in the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, not because any Republican vote was in danger, but because it was the aim to influence this Congressional district, and, thank God! they got a rebuke that they won't forget in an increased Democratic majority. Republican extravagance was extended further than the public treasury. Between the close of the war and the advent of a Democratic House of Representatives the Republicans gave away not less than 130,000,000 acres of the public domain. Why, the thirteen colonies had only 216,000,000 acres. Think of it! Territory equal in extent to four States of the size of New York presented to six corporations! The result is that any of you who may be disposed to take Horace Greeley's advice and go West will have to buy your land from corporations, paying them $10 an acre for ground that might be had for $1.50 an acre but for the extravagance and injustice of the Republican party.

Senator Wallace on Sectional Hate.—Ought passion and prejudice to control us in our judgment? Are we to be blinded by hate and sectional antagonism to our own wrongs and true interests? Is this the form of mind in which we ought to approach consideration of the grand issues of 1880? What of the republic as a whole? Has not your debt increased? Are not your expenses lessened? Are not economy and thrift the rule? Has not crime decreased? Are officials as corrupt as they were ten years ago? Do you long for that era of corrupt rule and vicious administration that the country saw from 1869 to 1873? Has not civil power replaced military in the whole land, and the mild and strong government of law supplanted that of the bayonet? Ten years ago three of the great States of the South—Virginia, Texas, and Mississippi—were yet under military rule. Is not their condition better now than then? Then Virginia had twenty-seven military districts, and elections were held by military order. Texas had thirty counties without civil organization. Fifty-nine cases were tried before military commissions in one year; there were 384 murders between January and September, 1869. While Mississippi was under military control military commissions were found unable to cope with crime that courts and juries now successfully meet. Local government in the South has given us the measure of peace and order they now have. Without it all would be still disorder. Individual control and oversight in every department of your Government are as necessary as they are in our own affairs. It is this that brings order out of chaos, and gives society and government their force and purity. It fits man for citizenship, unites him to society by his personal interests, compels him to govern himself. Ninety thousand officials with their power and money are part of the machinery that is wielded now to perpetuate the rule of agents. Troops at the polls and Federal election laws are further proofs of added power to the agents at the expense of the principal. Troops are few, but they wield the power of the whole people. One blue coat represents the majority of the law, to which we all bow. The excuse for Federal laws is fraud in the large cities. If in three wards dishonesty runs riot, all people are stigmatized and their right of free election supervised and controlled by Federal power. The cry of fraud is the cry of a thief when pursued. No man smirched with fraud can have the leadership in a contest for popular rights. The Democracy will strip for the contest and discard every weight. Fraud in Oregon or fraud in Philadelphia, frauds in Louisiana or frauds in New York are equally to be eliminated from the race. Real issues must be made luminous and well-defined. They must stand out bold, clear and sharp. We can not and we will not be handicapped to suit the ambition of any man. The manipulations of primaries, of presses, of bureaus, of conventions, are not methods of organization. We are about to join in a death-grapple for the rights of the people. Direct methods, clean hands, a spotless record, are the marks of the man who is to lead us in the coming race. Whether it be Bayard, fearless and pure, ever the champion of home-rule against corrupt government, a third term and consolidated power; or Hancock, the soldier advocate of civil rule, Pennsylvanian by birth and clean of hand; or Thurman, or McClellan, or Hendricks, issues of principle will be sharply defined and personal issues relegated to private life. Are our business interests advanced by the policy of division and distraction, or do we gain by advocating peace and unity? Why does each recurring Presidential election harass the business man? We want business and a market. Can we insure these best by widening our commercial field and encouraging production, or by flaunting the bloody shirt and crying, "Down with the Confederate Brigadiers?" Our national markets are in the South; their prosperity is our gain. It cannot be true that bloodshed and murder are the normal condition of the people South, for they send us this year over 5,000,000 bales of cotton—a larger crop than ever before. Our interest consists in continued prosperity, in increased production, in a contented people, in unity and peace. To encourage and stimulate production in every section is purely the teaching of selfish economy. Every manufacturer and distributor of merchandise is directly interested in stability and increased production in the South. Changes felt and changes feared are the bane of industry everywhere. Especially is this so among people who recognize that they have erred and been punished. They are sensitive to our opinion. Every change of political sentiment North is a terror to them, unsettles confidence, and destroys their belief in future prosperity. It is our interest to make them feel that they have passed their probation, and that we want the largest possible production of rice, cotton, sugar and tobacco to be exchanged for our manufactured goods. Have we not paid their proportion of public expenses, and the public debt out of our surplus earnings long enough? It is time that we should see that their prosperity is our gain from every point of view. If you would divide a solid South politically, cease to falsify and vilify them. Persecuted men cling together. Appeal to their selfish interests upon administrative questions, drive out sectionalism and recognize the truth that this country is one, that the States are united, and that as such it is the interest of every section to restore peace, unity and good government everywhere.

Concerning Lizards.

The common lizards of the West Indies are extremely fond of music. In a listening attitude, they will approach the open window of a room in which music is played, coming nearer and nearer, with heads elevated, intently listening. In a somewhat rare book, entitled "Barbados and Other Poems," by M. J. Chapman (London, 1835), this habit of the lizard is thus referred to:

> Gay sounds are heard within the lighted halls;
> The listening leaves the melody enthralls;
> The charmed zephyr pauses as he flies,
> And mingles with his strains the softest sighs;
> The wakened lizard leaves his bushy bed,
> Climbs to the lattice and erects his head.

A lizard, so engaged, had its tail accidentally cut off by the sudden closing of the window on the sill of which it was stationed. This curtailed lizard, however, continued to visit the spot, charmed by the music. After a short time it was noticed that the lost appendage was gradually replaced by two. This occurred at the house of a friend in Barbados. Mr. H. S. Moseley, in his charming work, "Notes by a Naturalist on the Challenger" (London, 1879), remarks: "It is curious how little animals seem to be frightened by a long wand, like a fishing-rod. I have seen Mr. Thwaites, in Ceylon, put a noose of palm fiber, fastened at the top of a rod of this kind, over the heads of numbers of lizards, and carry them off thus sniggled to put them into spirit for Dr. Gunther. The lizards sat quietly to receive the noose, though if we had moved a foot nearer to them they would have run off at once."—T. Bland, in Science News.

The Late Gen. Hooker.

Gen. Hooker was fully six feet in height and weighed in the neighborhood of 300 pounds. Of a florid complexion, his face sometimes wore a hectic flush that gave his round, good-natured face a boyish expression. Since his paralytic attack the General has led a quiet, sequestered life at the hotel in Garden City, Long Island. His man servant, Tom, was constantly at the General's side, to assist him to rise from his chair and to walk up and down stairs. When the Queens county hounds met at Garden City the General often followed the pack by the country roads in a carriage. He did not look upon the sport with favor, however, and often remarked that it was un-American. Gen. Hooker married, soon after quitting the service, the daughter of the Hon. William S. Groesbeck, of Cincinnati.

The case of Adam Parr, indicted for assault with intent to kill, was called for trial in a Baltimore court. The defense introduced evidence that the prisoner was not Parr, but a friend named Sweeny, who had obligingly consented to personate him, so that Parr could have time to escape. Sweeny had already suffered five months' imprisonment in consequence of the trick, and no further punishment was imposed.

Mrs. Lewis was alone at night in a house at Air Line, Ohio. She was awakened by the dropping of the key from the lock of the front door. Guessing aright that a burglar had pushed it out, she armed herself with a pistol, and, when he intruded his head, fired at it. His dead body was taken away by a companion, in the wagon that was to have carried the plunder.

ALL SORTS.

Wild tea grows in abundance in Arkansas county, Ark.

Senator Sharon's reception, which he gave to General and Mrs. Grant, cost $40,000.

The San Francisco mint is coining small gold pieces to supply a general public want.

The Chinese are invading the Sandwich islands. Over 2,000 Chinamen arrived at Honolulu in the second half of last year.

The two sisters of the late Gen. Hooker—Mrs. Wood and Mrs. Brainard—reside in Watertown, N. Y. They will receive a handsome legacy from the General.

Geological explorations have shown the probability that Russia contains beds of phosphate of lime of sufficient extent to supply Europe for an indefinite period.

Lawrence, Mass., has no church-bells within its limits, with the exception of the Catholic chimes. The mill-bells have always rung for meeting, and still do.

Several persons were poisoned in Denton, Md., by drinking cider from a zinc-lined water cooler, but prompt remedies prevented serious consequences.

Since the 1st of January last 125,000 immigrants have arrived at Castle Garden, and among the number there was a large percentage of blind, aged and crippled paupers.

It is said that the Emperor Alexander of Russia has become a confirmed hypochondriac. He shuts himself up for days, and can with difficulty be persuaded to take food.

Miss Yocum, a school-teacher of Kittias valley, Oregon, has taken up a land claim, fenced it, built a house, and this year raised 612 bushels of grain, beside teaching her school.

An embarrassed actor bounded on the stage of a San Francisco theater, in a scene depicting a robbery in a hotel office, and shouted: "Gag the safe, while I blow open the night clerk."

Cyrus Seaver, of Waterbury, Vt., was possessed by the idea that he must set fire to a building every Wednesday or die. He burned dwellings on three successive Wednesdays before he was detected.

Miss Caledonia Linton, Texas, residing on Cottonwood creek, while walking in the woods, met a large alligator. She got a rope, tied it around the alligator's neck, and dragged it two miles to her home.

Nearly all the negroes in and near Darlington, S. C., now own horses and cows, and many of them own land, which they are able to work with their own money. There is less stealing than formerly, churches are numerous and well supported, and newspapers are in demand.

There are fifty-three cotton mills in operation in North Carolina, and the consumption for the past year is estimated at 38,484 bales, or 17,207,800 pounds. According to the figures of the National Cotton Exchange, this was an increase of 16,641 bales over the previous year. Three large mills are now being erected, with a prospect that others will be added within the next twelve months.

TEAS!

THE LOWEST THEY HAVE BEEN FOR TWENTY YEARS

When teas a few years ago sold at $1.50 and $2.00 per pound the extreme high prices almost kept the use of tea as a luxury; this is not so any longer. Teas are now relatively cheaper than coffee and the demand for them so increased the last five years that we now sell 2 and 3 chests daily. We keep up our usual motto of no middlemen. Our teas go direct to our customers and we purchase direct from importers, thereby saving them the three profits of the speculators, jobbers and wholesale merchant, which is at least 16 to 20c per lb.

Fashion Freaks.

New gray gloves are blue tinted.

New reticules are square and flat.

Hand-painted lace is a late novelty.

Plain velvet cloaks will again be worn.

Colored street wraps are again fashionable.

Undressed kid gloves retain their popularity.

Large and small bonnets are equally fashionable.

Chemisettes and inside kerchiefs are again in vogue.

Many walking costumes are made with a jacket bodice.

Fichus of all sizes and in every imaginable shape are worn.

Tiger and leopard velvets are handsome trimming novelties.

There is no absolute rule about any detail of the toilet this season.

Flowers are as much used for garnitures for evening dresses as ever.

Cream-colored silk net, polka dotted and washable, is sold for neck scarfs.

Both very light colored and very dark costumes for street wear are in vogue.

Striped velvets are not so popular for parts of costumes as those with set figures.

Opera cloaks of white toile sanglier (boar's cloth) bids fair to be very fashionable.

The corsage boquet of the passing moment is one or several large red Turc satin roses.

White felt and plush hats and bonnets continue to be favorite opera and theatre chapeaux.

As many fabrics and accessories now enter into a bonnet as into the most elaborate dresses.

Lambrequin paniers and tabliers must be very ample and carefully draped to look well.

The tendency of the coiffure at the moment is towards classic simplicity and Greek ideas.

Medium and dark shades of kid gloves will be more worn for full dress than for many seasons past.

Singapore silk is the new name for a soft silk in rich cashmere colors and designs, used for milinery purposes.

Spencers of colored velvet with lace elbow sleeves, will be worn with white skirts for evening dress for young ladies.

Some foreign fashion journals says that dresses with but one skirt will certainly be worn this winter in heavy materials.

Turc satin is the new name for that soft changeable, twilled, yet lustrous fabric, known sometimes as satin de Lyons.

Lambrequin drapery, with paniers and tablier combined, is the favorite arrangement for Perisian toilets of ceremony.

Two or three bands of narrow ribbon are worn around the waves of banded hair that are worn with the Greek coil at present.

Corsage opening low in front, in shawl or heart shape, or square a la Pompadour, are fashionable for women of all ages.

White moutonne, a soft lamb's wool cloth, is used for dressy or evening or reception jackets for young girls, with oriental trimmings.

A novelty in evening dress fabrics is white toile sanglier, or boar's cloth, a heavy all wool material, dotted in raised fine points.

Paul dauphin gray and mastic shades of chincilla and beaver cloth, plain and ribbed, are again used for jackets, dolmans, visites and sacques.

New kid gloves show deep garnet or ruby shades, seal brown, navy blue, blue gray, olive, invisible green, and all the mystic and old gold tones of color.

The crowns of some plush bonnets seem to be composed entirely of jet beads, the embroidery actually covering completely the lace on which the design is wrought.

An Essay on Women.

After man came woman.

And she has been after him ever since.

She is a person of noble extraction, being made of a man's rib.

I don't know why Adam wanted to fool away his ribs in that way, but I suppose he was not accountable for all that he did.

It costs more to keep a woman than three dogs and a shot-gun.

But she pays you back with interest—by giving you a house full of children to keep you awake all night and smear molasses candy over your Sunday coat.

Besides a wife is a very convenient article to have about the house.

She is handy to swear at when you cut yourself with a razor, and don't feel like blaming yourself.

Woman is the superior being in Massachusetts.

There are about sixty thousand more of her sex than males in that state.

This accounts for the terrified, hunted-down expression of the single men who emigrate from the east.

Woman was not created perfect.

She has her faults—such as false hair, and false complexion, and so out.

But she is a great deal better than her neighbors, and she knows it.

Eve was a woman.

She must have been a model wife, for it cost Adam nothing to keep her in clothes.

Still, I don't think that they were a bit happy.

She couldn't go to sewing circles and air her information about everybody she knew, not excite the envy of other ladies by wearin her new winter bonnet to church.

Neither could she hang over the back fence and gossip with her near neighbor.

All these blessed privileges were denied her.

Poor Eve! she's dead now.

And the fashion she inaugurated is dead now.

If it hadn't been for the confounded "snaik" perhaps the ladies of the present day would dress as economically as Eve did.

But the only place where her primitive style is emulated is in certain portions of Africa, where the women consider themselves in full dress when they have on but a postage stamp, stuck in the center of the forehead.

Woman is endowed with a tremendous fund of knowledge and a tongue to suit.

She has the capacity for learning everything she was divinely intended to know, and a few extra items besides.

Young ladies take a great deal of stock in classics and learn fast.

When you see a young lady from Vassar, with an absorbed look in her eye, and her lips moving, you understand at once that she is memorizing a passage from Virgil.

But perhaps closer inspection will reveal the fact that she is only chewing gum.

A woman may not be able to sharpen a lead pencil, or hold an umberella, but can pack more articles in a trunk than a man can in a one-horse wagon.

The happiest period of a woman's life is when she is making her wedding garments.

The saddest is when her husband comes home late at night, and yells to her from the front door steps to throw out a handfull of keyholes of different sizes.

There is some curiosity in feminine nature.

For instance, I once knew a young lady who could easily pass another one on the street without looking around to see what she had on.

Poor thing! she was blind.

Special Announcement.

We take pleasure in announcing that we have made arrangements with the publishers of the STATE SENTINEL which enable us to make the following very liberal offer:

To all persons who pay their subscription account to date, we will send the COURIER and WEEKLY SENTINEL one year for $2.50 in advance. In addition to this we will make each subscriber a present of "THE LAW OF THE FARM," by Jas. B. McCreilis, of the Indiana bar. This valuable phamphlet ought to be in the hands of every farmer in the state. The work embraces the following subjects:

1st. How to buy a farm.
2nd. How far the farm extends, or its proper boundaries.

The INDIANA WEEKLY STATE SENTINEL is an eight-page paper, (the same as the COURIER) and will contain a supplement of two additional pages about half of the time. It is the recognized organ of the democracy of Indiana, and will always be found full of news of a general character. Its editorials present strong argument in favor of economy and against class legislation, and its agricultural department is adapted to the wants of every farmer.

Remember that the $2.50 must be paid in advance, and the COURIER subscription account must be paid to date, in order to secure this liberal offer. tf.

WAITING.

She was waiting at the lattice,
Where the snowy-plumed clematis
Translated for her gratis
What the breezes sung and sighed;

And the dainty tendernesses
Of the sunbeams on her tresses
Left her tranced in the caresses
Of the golden morning-tide,

The linnets were a-cooing,
And the dapper bees a-wooing,
And the dews were interviewing
All the flower-cozied fays;

While lightly from the dingle
The zephyr, lone and single,
Came up to intermingle
In the leaf-entangled maze.

She waits another coming,
Her heart its riches summing,
'Till suddenly a drumming
From the gravel-walk arose,

A hope triumphant filled her,
And clear the words that thrilled her;
"Look here, you Jane Matilder,
Come and knuckle them ar clothes!"

BURNED AS A WITCH.

The Horrible Tragedy Enacted this Year in a Russian Peasant Village.

[St. Petersburg Golos.]

In the city of Tikhvin, on Oct. 25, seventeen peasants were put on trial upon the accusation of having burned alive a peasant woman, Agraphena Ignatieff, 50 years old, as a witch. On the preliminary investigation it was discovered that Agraphena, from her girlhood, had been regarded as possessing the superhuman power of 'spoiling' people, that is of inflicting different diseases on the persons who displeased her, and also of curing them at her own will. Marrying a soldier, she left her native village, Zrucheff, and settled in St. Petersburg. Two years before her death she returned to her native village, a widow and penniless. The villagers were much alarmed at her appearance, being afraid that she would cause them great trouble. The boldest, or perhaps the most cowardly of them, wanted to at once shut up the witch in her house, and burn her. But at that time the villagers did not dare to carry out this plan. Agraphena was poor and sickly, and lived chiefly upon charity. Some of the village families, out of fear of the supposed witch, used to satisfy all her wishes; while others, especially the poor ones, had to refuse her demands, and were wont to ascribe to her all the cases of sickness and all the accidents that befel them. While living in St. Peterburg, Agraphena had become acquainted with the properties of many valuable medicines, and after her return to the village she often attended the sick, sometimes with wonderful success. This only confirmed the popular belief in her witchcraft. Unhappily for herself, she neither admitted nor denied openly that she was a witch; perhaps she preferred to leave things as they were, drawing, no doubt, a profit from the villagers' fears.

In January, 1879, a young woman was suddenly taken sick and died; then two other women were prostrated by some kind of nervous disease. They cried out that they were "spoiled" by the witch. Their parents tried to propitiate Agraphena with their tears and presents. But to all entreaties she simply answered: "I did not injure them, nor can I help them." Then there arose a great indignation; the men of the village assembled and decided to shut up the witch in her house, to feed her there, but on no account to allow her to visit any other house. This plan was to be carried out immediately. On Feb. 16th, a dozen of the villagers went to the house of Agraphena. They took along with them nails and planks. Arriving there, they searched the woman's trunk for charms; except several phials of medicines, they found nothing suspicious; but to the simple-minded and excited peasants these seemed to be the most positive proof of witchcraft. To make a long story short, Agraphena was shut up in the house, the door and windows were securely closed and nailed, and, though this had been no part of the original plan, the house was set on fire. The blaze attracted at once a crowd of people; many expressed their gratification, and nobody dared to interfere in behalf of the victim. Among the others came the brother of Agraphena. He rushed to the door and tried to break it in; but was not allowed to do so. "The Mir have so decided, let her burn," cried the mob. Some of the more humane, however, approached the window and shouted to the woman: "Confess thy crimes, and we will save thee." But she kept silent. To her despairing brother she answered: "Dear brother, I am not guilty." One of the crowd said aloud: "There is yet time to save the woman; let us do it at once, or we shall suffer severely." "Don't touch her," said a septuagenarian; "I answer for this deed with my head." The fate of the woman was sealed; nobody thereafter tried to save her. On the contrary, some of the men helped to spread the fire. Soon the ceiling feel down, and the unhappy victim of popular superstition perished in the flames. The people stayed at the place the whole night, till the fire went out of itself. On the next day the constable found a few charred bones. On the trial the peasants confessed their deed, but denied that they had committed a crime. The jury found only there, the ringleaders, guilty. One of these was the old man above mentioned. The rest were acquitted.

Home Testimony.

The recent completion of several branch roads in Minnesota, in the interest of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway company suggests a statement of the total mileage of this giant corporation, and we give elsewhere a complete official table of the different lines which it operates, together with a map showing the entire system as now completed. It will be seen that the total length of lines of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway is 2,158¼. This is the greatest mileage operated by any company in this country. It is made up of six divisions of the Chicago & Northwestern proper, and eight proprietary lines, and the whole system is subdivided into twenty lines and brances. To control successfully such a vast and complex system of railways evidently requires talent of the highest order, and the splendid condition, financial as well as physical, which the property now exhibits is sufficient testimony to the ability of the management.

The nucleus of this great system, the old Galena & Chicago Union railway, was opened from Chicago to Elgin, 42 miles, in 1850, only twenty-eight years ago. The Chicago & Northwestern Railway company came into being, as the successor of the Beloit & Madison Rock River Valley Union, and Chicago, St. Paul & Fond du Lac companies, in 1859. In 1865 the Galena & Chicago Union was consolidated with it, and in a few short years that have followed the young corporation has gone forward with astonishingly rapid strides, to its present proud position. What its future enlargement may be is left to imagination. A study of the map which shows the system already reaches into five states and a territory, may prove suggestive of possibilities yet ahead.—R. R. Age, Dec. 12, 1878.

HERE IS MORE OF IT.

The New York Herald has been looking over the business that is annually transacted by the Chicago & Northwestern Railway company, and the more the writer considers it the more he wonders at the immense magnitude of its transactions, the great length of its lines, the incomparable wealth, fertility, and expansiveness of the sections that it penetrates, and the brilliant future which this gigantic corporation has before it. In collecting the data for its article, the Herald finds that the Northwestern operates 2,100 miles of road, and reaches every important point almost in Northern Illinois, Wisconsin, in Northern Michigan, in Iowa, in Minnesota, and runs many miles in Dakota. If its lines were laid eastward from New York they would extend more than two-thirds of the way across the Atlantic, or they would reach from the pine clad hills of Maine to the sunny shores of the Gulf of Mexico. The Herald continues:

Take down your map and trace its routes. Fix your eye on Chicago as a starting point. Westward in nearly an an air line you will trace its California line until you reach the Missouri River at Council Bluffs, opposite Omaha—here is a single run of nearly 500 miles. Back to Chicago again you look northwest and follow another of its routes through Madison, the Capital of Wisconsin, into Minnesota, and on to St. Paul and Minneapolis—this is 400 miles more. Again looking from Chicago you can trace a line through Sparta, Wis., LaCrosse, in the same State; Winona, Owatonna and New Ulm, in Minnesota, and northwestward far into Dakota—here we have 625 miles more of road. Again, coming to Chicago, we see two lines running northwardly—one along the lake shore to Milwaukee, and thence to Fond du Lac, and the other running more inland, through Janesville, Watertown, etc., also to Fond du Lac; thence north, through Oshkosh, De Pere, Green Bay and Escanaba, Negaunee, Ishpeming and Marquette—here is another 440 miles of road. Then we have a line from Chicago to Elgin, Rockford and Freeport; another from Clinton, Ia., to Anamosa, in the same state; another from Kenosha on Lake Michigan, to Rockford, in northern Illinois; and, after all longer lines, we have many short spans to traverse before we have found out all of the Chicago & North-Western Railway.

The surprise and admiration that are here manifested by the writer at the colossal transactions of this single railway corporation—the natural offspring and product of the City of Chicago—will find other similar food to feed upon in the great west if he will take the trouble to look about him a little.

How the Money Goes

The people at Washington who annually disperse the public funds have made up their estimates for the next fiscal year, and ask congress for $186,347,129. That is the cost, as they compute, of running the government for the next twelve months.

Of this prodigious sum, the army, with the arsenals and coastwise forts, absorbs nearly thirty-one millions; the navy, fourteen and a half; pensions, nearly thirty-two and a half—an aggregate of $77,889,949 for these three items, or over five-ninths and nearly three-fifths of the entire amount called for.

No wonder that these three subjects occupy a prominent place in any effective discussion of retrenchment.

We find more than a million set down for foreign intercourse, which is a million poured through a sieve. Five millions are asked for the Indians—which few would grudge if the Indians got the five millions—and over two millions more for the rest of Mr. Schurz's department. The collection of the internal revenue is to cost upward of four millions. Erring Brother Key estimates that his postal business will expend about seven and three-quarter millions more than it earns. Five millions are asked for river and harbor improvements, which, as lobbied and log-rolled through congress nowadays, are a public scandal; while two and a half millions additional are asked for miscellaneous public works, and about three millions are for government buildings alone.

Possibly there may be one check on lavish public expenditure this winter. As the coming session of congress is the last regular session before the presidential election, on its record for economy parties and men will be tried in next year's canvass.—New York Sun.

No Money to Pay until Machine is Delivered to you and Examined.

It makes the shuttle, double-thread, lockstitch, (the same on both sides of the work) which received the highest reward at the Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia, Pa., 1876. And is complete with a larger assortment of attachments for fine work than any other machine, and reduced to only $25.

It is an easy and pleasant machine to operate, requires the least care, produces every variety of work, and will last until the next century begins. Strong, simple, rapid and efficient.

Use it once and you will use no other. The money cheerfully refunded if it will not outwork and outlast any machine at double the price.

Agents sell them faster than any other in consequence of their being the "best at the lowest price."

Each machine throughly warranted with written guarantee for five years. Kept in order free of charge; money refunded at once if not satisfactory.

It is the most solid, reliable, and satisfactory machine ever invented for all kinds of family work. It is an acknowleged unequivocal mechanical success, thoroughly tested and used in thousands of homes. An efficient, silent, rapid, reliable and ever-ready helper to the weary wife or seamstress, it will do the work of a family for a lifetime, or it will earn from $4 to $5 per day for any one who wishes to sew for a living. This machine costs less than half the price of any new machine of like quality. Has extra long, large-sized shuttle, easily removed. Extra large-sized bobbins, holding 100 yards of thread, doing away with the frequent rewinding of bobbins. It is built for strength and constant hard work. Interchangeable working parts, manufactured of fine polished steel. Will run for years without repairs; is simple to learn, easy to manage, understood perfectly in an hour, and always ready in a moment to do every description of heavy or fine work, at less cost or trouble than any other machine at any price ever did or can do. It will sew anything a needle can pierce, from lace or cambric to heavy cloth or harness, with any kind of thread, and will run off twenty yards per minute; it uses strong, straight needles, and never breaks them It cannot miss or drop a stitch, ravel or break the thread. If you have any other machine, buy this and have a better one. The ease and rapidity of its motion and quality of its work, are its best recommendations. It will hem, fell, tuck, braid, cord, bind, gather, quilt, ruffle, pleat, fold, scallop, shirr, roll, baste, embroider, run up braids, etc., with elegance, ease and quickness unsurpassed by any machine ever invented.

BEWARE OF IMPOSITION.

The price for our new machines are less than those asked by dealers in second-hand, rebuilt and refinished machines, or those selling out old stock to close up business, many such inferior and old style machines being offered as new at reduced prices; beware of imposition and only buy new machines. There are no new first-class machines offered as low as the "FAMILY," by many dollars.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

The mania for stock speculation is as great in New York as in the flush times succeeding the war. Lately the bulls and bears have been engaged in a fierce strife, and on Friday of last week the contest culminated in a bad break, in which many of the weak operators got terribly squeezed. Stocks dropped from 1 to 20 per cent. in a few minutes, and Wall street has not witnessed such a flurry of excitement in many years.

It is said that Jim Keene, the well-known Wall street operator, made $5,000,000 by the recent heavy tumble in stocks.

Graham, who instigated the murder of Armstrong, at Camden, N. J., for which Benj. Hunter was hanged, has been sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment.

The Eighth avenue railroad stables at New York were destroyed by fire a few days ago. Several firemen were injured and one killed by a falling wall. One hundred horses were burned. Pecuniary loss, $250,000.

William H. Vanderbilt has created a sensation by selling 250,000 shares of New York Central and Hudson River railroad stock to a syndicate represented by Drexel, Morgan & Co., of New York, and J. S. Morgan & Co., of London, for which he received $25,000,000 in Government bonds.... Edison claims that he has mastered every obstacle in the way of the economical subdivision of electric light, and about Christmas time he will give an exhibition of his light in Menlo Park.

THE WEST.

One Col. Deane was advertised to deliver a lecture in San Francisco, in which he proposed to denounce the management of the mines controlled by J. C. Flood and others. Dennis Kearney announced his intention of breaking up the meeting. Deane fulfilled his promise. Kearney attempted to carry out his programme, but was yanked away by the police and locked up in a cell....A terrible epidemic of scarlet fever prevails in the city of Springfield, Ill..... Immediately after the shooting of Harry Clifford, the footpad, by a barber named Buckhouse, at Leadville, Col., a powerful vigilance committee was organized by the citizens for the purpose of freeing the town of desperadoes. It began its work, as a dispatch from Leadville informs us, by marching to the jail and taking therefrom Patrick Stuart and Charles Frodsham, two notorious outlaws, and hanging them in a shed near the jail. They placed on the back of Frodsham a card warning a number of notorious characters to leave the city or take the same fate. Seeing that the committee were in dead earnest and meant business, the characters warned did not stand on the order of their going, but left in hot haste. The Leadvillians are now happy, and peace and quiet reigns in the hitherto desperado-ruled streets.

The Cincinnati papers report that the Cincinnati Division Paper Manufacturers' Association held a private meeting at the Gibson House, in that city, last week, which was fully attended. It is understood that they decided upon an advance in prices of both news and book papers, ranging from 1 to 1¼ cents per pound.

Fanny Davenport is at Haverly's Chicago Theater this week, with her own company, where the business is immense. A round of attractions, including "Pique," "Divorce," "As You Like It," "London Assurance" and "Oliver Twist," are on the bills for the week, and they are all cast to the full strength of an exceptionally fine troupe. Fanny has inherited the histrionic ability of a family of actors, her father, E. L. Davenport, having been, in the opinion of a great many, the finest actor ever in America..... The village of Farmington, Minn., has been almost blotted out of existence by fire. The property destroyed was valued at $150,000. ....The San Luis valley, in Colorado, is being rapidly populated by Mormons proselyted in the Southern States. They agree to obey the laws of Colorado prohibiting polygamy, and get their lands direct from the State at a low price.....D. J. McCann for several years a heavy contractor for furnishing and forwarding Indian supplies, has been convicted at Cheyenne of fraudulently disposing of Government property, and sentenced to imprisonment for a year and a half in the penitentiary, to pay a fine of $1,000 and the costs of the suit, and replace the property stolen.

Two fine steamers went to the bottom of Lake Michigan on the morning of Nov. 24—the John A. Dix at Manistee, Mich., and the City of New York at Ludington. The former struck a sunken anchor, and the latter ran aground and filled.... The beer brewers of Cincinnati have decided to "pool their issues." A gigantic company, with a capital of $8,000,000, is to be formed, all the brewers in the city to be embraced in the consolidation.

Advices from Los Pinos Agency to Nov. 25 report that the late "Chief Ouray has miscalculated his power and cannot deliver the murderers of Meeker and Thornburgh if he would. The situation at the agency is far from enviable. Rumors of an impending attack prevail, and the building in which the Commissioners and their escort lodge has been loopholed and provisioned."..... A fire at Rochester, Minn., burned the Oronoco flouring mills and 30,000 bushels of wheat. Loss, $60,000....Mr. Sol. A Smith, President of the Merchants' Savings, Loan and Trust Company Bank of Chicago, died in that city last week.... Two German brothers named Eichenand, living in Cass county, Ill., were cruelly murdered, a few days ago, by two brothers named John and Robert Taylor. A feud had for some time existed between the two families.

A suit, involving the title to over 164 acres of land on which Leadville is situated, has been decided in the United States District Court in Denver. The suit was brought by a smelting company to eject some squatters from the possession of part of the land, and the decision of the court must have been a stunner to the company. It was to the effect that the land rightly belonged to the United States Government.

Two Indians were recently hanged at Yakima, Washington Territory, for murders committed in the Indian war two years ago.

THE SOUTH.

Two criminals were executed in South Carolina on Friday, Nov. 21. One was Edward Holmes, a boy of 16, convicted of outraging a 2-year-old daughter of A. D. Hampton in Union county. The other criminal was George Garry, who was hanged at Beaufort for the murder of a colored man named Brown. Two murderers were hanged on the same day at Denison, Texas. They were George and Andrew Brown, brothers, who murdered Dr. McLean in Montague county, Texas, in 1876.

Cubbie, the desperado who killed Porter in Texas, last winter, has secured another postponement of his trial owing to the inability of the State to produce its witnesses.

GENERAL.

A citizen of New York, a Cuban by birth, has written to the State Department at Washington, complaining of the imprisonment of his family in Santiago, Cuba, and asking for their speedy liberation. The action of the Spanish officials in detaining the persons spoken of appears to have been unprovoked, as they were provided with American passports and were in no degree dangerous to the peace and safety of the colony. Now that the insurrection has been renewed, outrages of this kind may be expected weekly.

Excellent prospects for the Northern Pacific railroad are reported by General Manager Sargent, and it is promised that the entire road will be completed in 1883....Gen. Grant will sail from New York for the West Indies and Mexico on the 27th of December.

Gen. Grant, in a letter to Admiral Ammen, acknowledges the receipt of a letter from the Admiral in regard to the mission of Thomas De Franco, representative of the Nicaraguan Government, who has come to this country to aid in the formation of a compact to construct the Nicaraguan canal. Gen. Grant says he will meet the gentleman in Philadelphia on the 16th of December, and discuss the matter with him.

WASHINGTON.

The case of the Postoffice Department against the lottery establishments is to be decided by the Supreme Court on an agreed case. ....The United States Treasurer last week transferred $10,000,000 in gold to the Assay Office at New York, to be used in paying for foreign gold deposited for conversion into American coin. This makes a total of $60,000,000 transferred for that purpose since Aug. 12.

The Assistant Attorney General for the Postoffice Department has given an opinion to the effect that lottery letters reaching the Dead Letter Office may be returned to the sender, and that a letter must be addressed to a lottery agent as such to warrant its detention. ....It is said that the President will not nominate Mr. Ramsey for Secretary of War until Mr. McCrary is confirmed as Judge of the Iowa Circuit.

POLITICAL.

Official vote of Nebraska at the late election for Supreme Judge: Cobb, Republican, 46,113; Wakely, Democrat, 20,827; Saxon, Greenback, 4,725.

Gen. Stewart L. Woodford, of New York, is making Republican speeches in Louisiana....The Indiana Republican State Central Committee has appointed the 25th of February as the day for holding the Republican State Convention.

FOREIGN.

The excitement throughout Ireland over the arrest of Daly, Killen and Davitt is increasing, and a number of disturbances are reported. In Dublin the feeling of indignation is intensely bitter, and many who have heretofore stood aloof from national political troubles are now stepping forward and speaking boldly in favor of a change in the Government of Ireland. The Home-Rule agitation has been given a fresh impetus, and the party will, undoubtedly, sweep all before it at the next election. In the South of Ireland, particularly in the counties of Limerick, Waterford, Kerry, Cork and Tipperary, there is great uneasiness felt as to the future. It is generally admitted that Ireland is about to enter into a crisis from which she may come out a great deal better or a great deal worse than she is now. The Government will not take any half-way steps toward crushing out the national feeling, and the Nationalists are as determined as they ever were that the fight shall be made one in which all classes of the Irish people can take sides in opposition to the home Government.

Enthusiastic meetings of Irishmen and Irish sympathisers were held on Saturday and Sunday, Nov. 22 and 23, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Leeds, Manchester and Birmingham, at all of which resolutions were passed protesting against the imprisonment of Davitt, Daly and Killen. Nearly 20,000 persons attended a meeting in County Mayo, Parnell being the principal orator....A descent on the Peruvian coast was lately made by the Chilians, resulting, after a severe engagement, in the capture of Pisagua. The Peruvian army retired inland, followed by the invaders....Advices from Cuba, through Spanish channels, represent that the Government troops have gained several decisive victories over the insurgent forces.

A new Italian Ministry has been formed, with Signor Cairoli as Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Signor Depretis as Minister of the Interior....The widow of Charles Dickens died at her residence, Gloucester Crescent, Regent's Park, London, a few days ago, after an illness of eighteen months.

John Thaddeus Delane, for many years editor-in-chief of the London Times, is dead....Advices from South America report that a great battle has taken place at Iquique between the allied and Chilian armies. The former were defeated. The Peruvian corvette Pilcomayo has been captured by the Chilians.... The examination of the Irish agitators arrested for sedition was concluded at Sligo the other day. Daly was released on bail, while Killen and Davitt were remanded for a further hearing.

A cable dispatch says that Davitt, one of the Irish agitators arrested for sedition, was arraigned on Nov. 25, and held for trial in bail of £500.

Russia is said to be organizing a plan for the capture of Merv in the spring, by the forcible passage of troops through Persia, if necessary....The National Legislature of France has returned to Paris, after an absence of nine years.

Save the Rags.

"A penny saved is a penny got," is a maxim as true as it is old. And there is many a neglected opportunity in almost every household by which pennies that are otherwise allowed to go to waste might be saved to the family. Take the one item of rags. How few housewives think of saving the little scraps of calico, of linen, and the old, worn-out clothes, and selling them to the paper-manufacturers? Thousands upon thousands of dollars are thus wasted every year that ought to go into the family coffers. If housewives and their children and helpmates would carefully save all the rags through the year, and lay aside the receipts from the sales, they would be astonished, when the holidays came around, at the size of the fund accumulated from this source. The recent rapid advance in the price of rags renders it doubly important that the matter should be attended to. If the "gude wife" don't feel like bothering her head and hands with the matter, then let her encourage the children in the work. It will pay to save the rags. Don't neglect it.

The Advance in Paper.

The paper-makers seem to have become crazy upon the subject of prices of paper, and are rushing things in a manner most remarkable. Within a period of sixty days the prices of print and book papers have advanced over 50 per cent. Paper that was being sold in September at 6¼ cents per pound is now put upon the combination price-list at 10 cents per pound. At a meeting of the Chicago Division of the American Paper-Makers' Association, held in Chicago on Nov. 25, the following prices to dealers were fixed upon:

Straw print	8c per pound
No. 1 news (50 per cent. wood)	9c per pound
Ext a news (all rags)	10c per pound
No. 2 book (machine finished)	11c per pound
Sized and super-calendered book	12c per pound

These are the manufacturers' prices until the next meeting of the association, which will occur the latter part of December, at which time another advance of from 1½ to 2½ cents per pound may be expected.

In return for jokes played upon others, some one filled the overcoat pocket of E. P. Guise, a young attorney of Williamsport, Pa., with steel pens. A number of them stuck in his hand, and in taking them out several broke off. The hand is terribly swollen, and it is feared that the consequences may be fatal.

THE NATION'S FINANCES.

Annual Report of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Hon. John J. Knox, Controller of the Currency, in his annual report to Secretary Sherman, gives a brief history of the growth of the debt of the United States, and the financial operations of the Government from the beginning of the war to the present time. The report says:

"The total number of national banks organized from the establishment of the national-banking system, Feb. 25, 1863, to Nov. 1 of the present year is 2,438. Of these, 307 have gone into voluntary liquidation by the vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of their respective capitals, and eighty-one have been placed in the hands of receivers for the purpose of closing up their affairs, leaving 2,050 in operation at the date last named.

"Since my last annual report thirty-eight banks have been organized, with an aggregate authorized capital of $3,595,000, to which $2,390,440 in circulating notes have been issued. Thirty-eight banks with an aggregate capital of $4,450,000 have voluntarily discontinued business within the said period, and eight banks have failed, having a total capital of $1,080,000. The insolvent banks included two, with a capital of $700,000, which failed after having gone into voluntary liquidation."

The report is accompanied by tables exhibiting the aggregate average capital and deposits on May 31, 1879, of all classes of banks other than national, and the capital and deposits of the national banks on June 14 following. The aggregate capital of the various classes of State, savings and private banks, says the Comptroller, "has diminished from $719,400,000 in 1876 to $656,500,000 in 1879, and the aggregate deposits have fallen off from $2,075,300,000 in 1876 to $1,893,500,000 in 1879—a reduction of $62,900,000 in capital and $181,800,000 in deposits during the last four years. The national-banking capital has diminished $45,100,000, but the deposits of the national bankers are almost precisely the same that they were in 1876. Savings banks with capital show a reduction of about $1,000,000 in capital and the same amount in deposits. The capital and deposits of State banks and private bankers are less by $17,000,000 and $83,000,000, respectively. The greatest reduction, however, is in the deposits of savings banks without capital, which have diminished $97,500,000."

Upon the subject of the funding of the public debt the Comptroller says:

"The great war debt of the United States was contracted in less than four and a half years. In 1835 the country was entirely out of debt, and on Jan. 1, 1861, the whole debt of the Union amounted to but $66,243,721. During the next six months it increased at the rate of about $4,000,000 a month, being, on the 1st day of July, 1861, $90,580,873. During the next year it increased at the rate of more than $36,000,000 per month, and at the close of the fiscal year ending July 1, 1862, it had reached $524,176,412. At the end of the succeeding year it was considerably more than twice that amount, being, on July 1, 1863, $1,119,772,138. During the following year it increased nearly $700,000,000, reaching on July 1, 1864, the sum of $1,815,784,370. During the next nine months, to the close of the war, April 1, 1865, the debt increased at the rate of about $2,000,000 a day, or about $60,000,000 a month, and for the five months next thereafter, about $3,000,000 per day, or about $90,000,000 a month, reaching its maximum on Aug. 31, 1865, at which date it amounted to $2,845,907,626.

"An aggregate of more than $1,276,000,000 of temporary obligations of the Government, of which $830,000,000 bore interest at 7.30 per cent., was funded within the three years which followed the close of the war, and the skill and good judgment displayed in so doing can only be fully appreciated by those who are familiar with the difficulties and delicate conditions under which this great work was accomplished.

"The temporary loans, certificates of indebtedness, 7.30 notes, and all the other items of the debt, except the legal-tender notes and fractional currency, which have been largely reduced, have been paid, have matured and ceased to bear interest, or have been funded into 5-20 6 per cents., of which more than one thousand six hundred millions ($1,602,583,350) were issued.

"The acts of July 14, 1870, and of Jan. 20, 1871, authorized the issue of bonds for the purpose of refunding the 5-20 6 per cents. The former act authorized the issue of $1,500,000,000 of bonds, $200,000,000 of which were to be 5 per cents., payable ten years after date, at the pleasure of the United States; $300,000,000 of 4½ per cents., payable in fifteen years; and $1,000,000,000 payable in thirty years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. The act provided that these bonds should not be sold for less than their par value in coin, and that the proceeds should be applied to the redemption of the 5-20 bonds. The latter act increased the amount of the 5-per-cent. bonds to $500,000,000, and provided that the whole amount of bonds issued should not exceed the amount originally authorized; and the subsequent act of Jan. 25, 1879, authorized the refunding or exchanging of any other 5 or 6-per-cent. bonds which were redeemable at the pleasure of the Government.

"The whole amount of the funded debt, on the 1st of July, 1871, was $1,915,342,700, of which $1,427,097,300 consisted of 5-20 bonds, and $194,567,300 of 10-40 bonds. On the first day of August, 1871, nearly $66,000,000—$65,775,550—of new 5-per-cent. bonds had been subscribed for, chiefly by the national banks. During the same month an agreement was entered into by the Secretary—Secretary Boutwell's report, 1871, p. xvii.—with Jay Cooke & Co., for the sale of the remainder of $200,000,000 of said bonds, and, in the month of January, 1873, similar arrangements were made for the sale of a large additional amount. The remainder of the $500,000,000—$178,548,300—was sold during the next three years, the Secretary of the Treasury stating, in his report of Dec. 6, 1875, that he had 'the pleasure of announcing to Congress that the funding of $500,000,000 6-per-cent. bonds into those bearing 5-per-cent. interest has been accomplished.'—Secretary Bristow's report, 1875, p. xii."

Referring to the resumption operations of the Treasury Department, the report says:

"The act of Jan. 14, 1875, required the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem 'in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50,' on and after Jan. 1, 1879. At the time of the passage of this act the leading industries and general business of the country were very much depressed. The agricultural classes were largely in debt, and the failures of mercantile establishments and manufacturing corporations in the three years previous represented more than $500,000,000. During the succeeding years an era of economy supervened, agricultural products greatly increased, and the balance of trade was turned largely in our favor, the excess of exports over imports for the fiscal year 1876 being more than $79,000,000, in 1877 more than $151,000,000, in 1878 exceeding $257,000,000, and for the year ending Sept. 30 last more than $294,000,000. For 1878 the excess was more than three times as great as that of 1876, and more than two-thirds greater than that of 1877.

"The Resumption act not only fixed the day of resumption, but authorized the Secretary, in order to prepare and provide therefor, to use any surplus revenues not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, any of the bonds of the United States described in the act of July 14, 1870. Under this act, the Secretary in 1877 sold at par in coin $15,000,000 of 4½'s, and $25,000,000 of 4's, and in April, 1878, $50,000,000 of 4½ per cents., at a premium of 1½ per cent. The coin in the treasury continually increased, so that on the day of resumption the Secretary had $135,382,639 of gold coin and bullion, and, in addition, $30,557,532 in silver coin, the gold coin alone being equal to more than 40 per cent. of the United States notes then outstanding.

"The Comptroller has for a series of years presented in his reports the following tables, showing the amount of treasury notes and of national-bank notes outstanding at the dates named therein, with the currency price of gold and the gold price of currency at the same dates:

"On July 1, 1864, $100 in gold was worth $258 in treasury notes; on Aug. 31, 1865, the day when the public debt was at its maximum, it was worth more than $144; and on Jan. 1, 1870, $120; since which time the treasury and the national-bank notes have gradually increased in value, until the beginning of the present year, when they each reached the same purchasing power as gold coin. This may be seen by the following table, which gives the value in cents of the standard gold dollar in legal-tender paper dollars on July 1 of each year from 1864 to 1878, and also on Jan. 1 of the present year:

	Cents.
1864	[illegible]
1865	[illegible]
1866	[illegible]
1867	[illegible]
1868	140.7
1869	[illegible]
1870	116.8
1871	112.4
1872	114.2
1873	115.7
1874	[illegible]
1875	114.9
1876	[illegible]

1879	100.0

"During the last fifteen years gold coin has been used by the banks in comparatively small amounts as a reserve, and by the people only in the payment of customs duties and in purchase of foreign exchange. If it was used for home purposes, it was first converted into paper money; but since the day of resumption the treasury note and the national-bank note have been generally preferred in business transactions to coin itself.

"The old forms of tables, giving the amount and kind of currency in circulation, are now obsolete, and must be superseded by new ones, which shall include not only the paper currency but also the coin of the country. The total amount of the circulating medium cannot, for this reason, be hereafter accurately given, such total being affected by estimates of the amount of the coin in the country. The latter amount is estimated by the Director of the Mint to have been $427,000,000 on the 1st day of November, in this year, of which amount $121,000,000 was in silver coin. If this estimate is correct, the circulating medium on that date was composed as follows:

Treasury notes outstanding	$346,681,016
National-bank notes outstanding	337,181,418
Gold in the treasury, less certificates held by the banks	157,980,198
Silver in the treasury	31,078,631
Coin in the banks (Oct. 2)	42,173,741
Estimated amount of coin held by the people	261,478,515
Total	$1,165,553,504

"The estimated total currency of the country on Nov. 1 thus appears to have been more than $1,165,000,000, which amount is at least $380,000,000 in excess of the highest point reached between the suspension and the resumption of specie payment."

The Comptroller urgently recommends that all the national banks shall take advantage of the present influx of gold to accumulate in their vaults an amount equal to the total cash reserve required by law. He indulges the hope that the reports of another year may show them to be possessed of at least $100,000,000 of gold coin.

THE PENSION OFFICE.

Commissioner Bentley's Annual Report.

Hon. J. A. Bentley, Commissioner of Pensions, has completed his annual report to the Secretary of the Interior. It shows that on the 30th of June last there were 242,755 persons in the United States receiving pensions from the Government. The pension-list is now larger than at any previous time. The present list is composed of 125,150 army invalid pensioners, 81,174 army widows, children, and dependent relatives, 1,844 navy invalids, 1,772 navy widows, etc., 11,621 surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, and 21,194 widows of deceased soldiers of that war. During the year 31,346 new names were added to the list, and 908 names which had previously been dropped from the rolls, mainly from failure for three years to claim their pensions, were restored, and 13,497 were, for various reasons, dropped.

The aggregate amount of one year's pension to all pensioners on the rolls is $25,493,742.15, but the actual annual payments exceed that sum by several million dollars. This arises from the fact that nearly all the newly-admitted army and navy cases have several years' accrued pension due at the time of admission, which is paid at the first payment.

During the year the first payments to new pensioners amounted to $5,763,758, of which $4,375,147 was paid to army and navy invalids, widows, etc., and $7,388,611 to survivors and widows of the war of 1812. The first payment to pensioners of the war of 1812 will rapidly fall off, while a material increase may be expected in the army and navy cases for several years, owing to the removal of the limitation upon the commencement of pensions by the acts of Jan. 25 and March 3, 1879.

The above-named acts were passed after the estimates for the pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, were submitted, and were not, therefore, taken into account when the appropriation was made, and there will be a deficiency in the pension appropriation for the current fiscal year as nearly as can now be estimated as follows: $5,000,000 army pensions and $30,000 navy pensions, which should be provided for, in order that the pensions for the June quarter may be promptly paid. There were on the 30th of June 136,645 unsettled claims for arrears, an increase over last year of 16,258. To them are to be added about 40,000 old claims which were revived by the Arrears act of Jan. 25, 1879, or called up from the rejected files since that date, for further consideration, and these, with the new claims filed since the close of the year in excess of the number settled, added to the number shown by the record, will aggregate fully 200,000.

Since the passage of the Arrears act new invalid, widows', minor children, and dependent relatives' claims have been filed at an unprecedented rate, the invalid claims being more than double the rate of the receipts at any previous period except in 1866, and the widows' class exceeded any year since 1867, and twice as numerous as any year since 1871.

It is estimated that at the close of the year there will be not less than 250,000 unsettled cases before the office.

Gen. Grant's Billiard Saloon.

A very interesting bit of history, in which Gen. Grant figures as one of the proprietors of a billiard hall, is contained in an old lease now in possession of a gentleman of San Francisco, and on record. The document is dated Oct. 5, 1853, by the terms of which Isaac M. Hall leases to Henry D. Wallen, Ulysses S. Grant and Thomas H. Stevens the rear and eastern room on the first floor in the Union Hotel, situated on Kearney street. The room, which was about eighty feet in depth, by the length of the building, was leased for one year, at a monthly rental of $500, payable in advance. It was expressly stipulated in the document that the premises "shall be used for billiard tables exclusively, and for no other business or purpose whatever, and that no article of any description shall be sold therein." The lessees were to have the privilege of leasing the premises for the second part of one year more, provided due notice should be given; and it is very probable that they had them a long time after, for two years later the following assignment was made:

"I, U. S. Grant, of the Fourth U. S. infantry, hereby empower Lieut. F. Stevens, U. S. N., and Capt. H. D. Wallen, U. S. A., to sell my proportion of the billiard tables, fixtures, etc., in the Union Hotel, San Francisco.

"U. S. Grant, Capt. U. S. A.

"San Francisco, Dec. 26, 1855."

Norfolk, Va., did an export business last year of $10,000,000, and with her cotton returns now ranks as the second cotton-exporting port in the United States. It is the first peanut port in the world, receiving the entire crop of Virginia, which is much larger than the growth of Tennessee and North Carolina.

In the month of October the elevated railroads of New York city carried 4,958,853 passengers—nearly 5,000,000! This is an average of about 160,000 a day, counting seven days in the week.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The Report of Commissioner Hayt.

The annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shows that during the past year there has been among the Indians in general a steady advance in civilization, which has no parallel in any previous year. In this the Ogalalla and Brule Sioux have taken the lead, and their progress during the last eighteen months has been simply marvelous. It is no longer a question whether the Indians will work. Those who are anxious to do so are now largely in the majority. From all except the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory there is a call for lands in severalty. There is a largely increased desire for houses and agricultural implements, wagons, etc., and for citizens' clothing. The following shows the substantial results of Indian labor during the year. They are much larger than ever before, and but for the severe drought in the Indian Territory and among the Navajoes the increased crops would have been much greater, especially in the corn crop, which is less than that of last year. By Indians, exclusive of the five civilized tribes of the Indian Territory, in 1879: Number of acres broken, 27,131; number of acres cultivated, 157,056; number of bushels of wheat raised, 328,637; bushels of corn, 642,285; bushels of oats and barley, 189,054; bushels of vegetables, 330,693; tons of hay cut, 46,883.

By the five civilized tribes: Number of acres cultivated, 273,000; bushels of wheat raised, 565,400; bushels of corn, 2,015,000; bushels of oats and barley, 200,000; bushels of vegetables, 336,000; tons of hay cut, 176,500.

The only sure way to make the Indians advance in civilization under the best condition to promote their welfare is to give each head of a family 160 acres of land, and to each unmarried adult eighty acres, and to issue patents for the same.

The history of the Ute outbreak is given in detail, without disclosing any new facts. In reference to the removal of the Utes to some other location, the Commissioner suggests that a commission be appointed to visit the tribe and obtain its consent to remove from the State upon the payment of the full value of the lands now occupied. The advantages to be obtained by removing them to the Indian Territory are, first, the abundant supply of arable land and cultivation; second, immunity from white encroachment; and, third, better security for keeping the Indians peaceable, as the country is not adapted to Indian fighting, and everywhere offers open fields for the use of artillery and all appliances of civilized warfare, so that, whatever be the disposition of the Indians, if a resort to force should be necessary, it could be made effective in the interests of peace. The Commissioner considers the enactment of a bill extending the criminal laws of the respective States or Territories over the Indian reservation of vital importance.

The Indian policemen have shown the utmost fidelity to the Government, and have, when necessary, arrested even friends and relatives with absolute impartiality. Several instances are cited in proof of their fidelity. There is but one drawback, which should be removed by Congress, and that is the inadequacy of the pay, which by law is fixed at $5 per month. The Commissioner recommends that it be increased to $15 per month.

The following novel recommendation is made: A penal settlement for the confinement and reformation of the more turbulent and troublesome individuals among the various Indian tribes is a pressing want. For murderers and the worst class of refractory Indians one settlement should be in Florida, which is far enough from the Indian reservations to make any attempt at escape hopeless. Another settlement should be at some point in the Northwest, where considerable land can be found upon which imprisoned Indians may be taught to work for their own support. The settlements should be guarded by sufficient force to exercise perfect discipline, and trades as well as agriculture should be taught, and when the time arrived for them to be returned home the captives would have reached an advanced stage of civilization. Inside of Indian reservations men are everywhere found driving a thrifty business in selling the latest and best patterns of arms and fixed ammunition to non-civilized Indians. The sales thus made are limited in amount only by the ability of Indians to purchase. Previous to the late Ute outbreak the Indians were amply supplied with Winchester and Spencer rifles and fixed ammunition, obtained from traders outside their reservations. There is no statute against this crime, and the Commissioner recommended that legislation be especially directed against such sales, by Congress prohibiting under severe penalty the sale of both firearms and fixed ammunition, and further legislation requiring non-civilized Indians to be disarmed are the only common-sense and practicable methods of putting an end to this dangerous traffic.

The Poncas are reported as doing well on their new reservation, and rapidly advancing in the ways of civilization. The progress of the youths trained in the Indian schools is of the most hopeful character. Exclusive of the five civilized tribes of the Indian Territory there are now over 7,100 Indian children taught at the agency schools. The five civilized tribes have 6,250 children at school.

Among other recommendations of the report is one for the enactment of the law to prevent polygamy and provide for legal marriages among the Indians. For this purpose it is proposed to make civil magistrates of Indian Agents.

President's Message in Brief.

Foreign Relations.—The message states that the relations of the United States to all foreign nations are of the most cordial and friendly character.

Polygamy.—The violation of the statute on polygamy by the inhabitants of Utah forms the subject of a brief but sharp chapter. The President thinks that the time has arrived when some decisive action ought to be taken upon this important matter. He recommends that citizens of the Territory who are guilty of polygamy be deprived of the right of suffrage and debarred from jury duty, and that a test-oath be required to ascertain whether, in fact, they are polygamists.

Financial.—The message congratulates Congress and the country upon the accomplishment of the resumption of specie payments. As an additional step in resumption, it is recommended that the legal-tender notes be retired, and that the coinage of silver dollars shall cease. This latter recommendation is made through fear that under existing conditions there is danger that the country will be drained of its gold, and that silver will wholly replace gold unless the coinage is suspended. It is further recommended that legislation fixing the ratio between gold and silver be deferred until after the Monetary Congress shall arrive at some definite conclusion.

Sinking Fund.—Inasmuch as it has been the policy of the Government, since the adoption of the constitution, to pay all debts as soon after they are incurred as possible, the President recommends a sinking fund be provided for the payment of all obligations within a limited time, and, if the resources of the Government are not sufficient for this, that then a tax on tea and coffee should be levied, as that will be the only means convenient, and the only one less felt by the people.

Indian Bureau.—The President discourages the renewed agitation of the question of the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department, on the ground that such a discussion tends to obstruct the officers of the Indian Bureau in the execution of their duties, and produces no good.

Nicaragua Canal.—The President earnestly favors the inter-oceanic canal project, and expresses the hope that legislation to facilitate the work may be enacted without delay.

Supervisors and Marshals.—There is quite a lengthy passage on the subject of Supervisors and United States Marshals which is as stalwart as the most radical could wish. The President recommends the passage of appropriations sufficient to pay Supervisors and Marshals for their service during the portion of the fiscal year for which no appropriation was made, and also recommends similar appropriations for the future.

Washington Monument.—The message urges Congress to make an appropriation sufficient to complete the long-neglected Washington monument.

Foreign Commerce.—The message directs the attention of Congress to the condition of our foreign commerce, and asks that all possible legislation to extend our commerce be enacted, especially in respect to the carrying trade.

Civil Service.—The President asks Congress to devise some means for putting an improved civil service upon a permanent basis which shall be beyond the reach of the politicians. He suggests the appointment of a commission which shall have the power to make all appointments under the General Government, the tenure of office to be good behavior.

TRADE-MARKS.

Important Supreme Court Decision.

A very important decision by the Supreme Court of the United States has just been announced. It is to the effect that the National Trade-Mark statute is unconstitutional. Some idea of the magnitude of the interest involved may be formed from the fact that no less than 6,000 trade-marks have been registered at the Patent Office, and about 200 applications for registry are now pending. Ten sections of the Revised Statutes (4,937-47) are devoted to trade-marks. There would seem to have been no legislation by Congress on this subject prior to 1870. The object of the law was to place the devising of a trade-mark upon the footing of an invention or of authorship. The court, with evident good sense, replies:

"The ordinary trade-mark has no necessary relation to invention or discovery. It is generally the outgrowth of a considerable period of use, rather than of sudden invention, and is often the result of accident, rather than of design. The attempt to classify a trade-mark with the writings of authors is open to objections equally strong. The latter involve an element of originality, as do also inventions; while the trade-mark is generally nothing more than an adaptation of something already in existence as a distinctive symbol of the person using it. It does not depend upon novelty, invention, discovery or any other work of the brain, but is founded simply upon priority of appropriation. The court is, therefore, of opinion that, while such legislation as that in question may be a judicious aid to the common law on the subject of trade-marks, and may be within the competency of Legislatures, whose general powers embrace that class of subjects, it is not authorized by the constitutional provision concerning authors and inventors and their writings and discoveries."

It was attempted to save a part of the Trade-Mark law, by basing it on the right of Congress, under the constitution, to regulate commerce between the States. But it is obvious that the statute was not designed for any such restrictive use, and it had to be upheld entire or declared a nullity. It is to be regretted that the constitution was not made broad enough to cover trade-marks; but it was not, and the decision of the Supreme Court was a legal necessity.

Jefferson's Farewell.

Jefferson's last hours were enlightened by the Christian's hope, but there is something pathetic in this blending of a father's affection and a philosopher's faith. Two days before dying, Thomas Jefferson told his daughter, Mrs. Randolph, that in a certain drawer in an old pocket-book she would find something intended for her, and afterward, looking there, she found the following verses written by him:

Life's visions are vanished, its dreams are no more.
Dear friends of my bosom, why bathed in tears?
I go to my Father, I welcome the shore
Which crowns all my hopes, or which buries my cares.
Then farewell, my dear, my loved daughter, adieu!
The last pang of life is in parting with you!
The seraphs await me long shrouded in death;
I will bear them your love on my last parting breath.

What's in a Word Anyhow?

The examination of candidates for teachers' positions in our public schools sometimes develops some amusing and ingenious answers to the conundrums propounded by the Board of Examiners. A few days ago a young lady submitted her paper in word analysis, which contained the following definitions: "Autonomy" was defined as "the religion of the automaton." "Bestial," as "excellence, or that which is best." "Optimist," as "one versed in the science of the eyes."—San Francisco Chronicle.

AUBURN COURIER.

AN Englishman happened to be present at the Yorktown celebration, last month, and, after surveying the situation and surroundings, said: "I can well understand now why Lord Cornwall surrendered Yorktown; if I owned such a place, I would give it up myself.

THUS far five telegraphic cables have been laid in the Atlantic ocean, connecting Europe and America, and are all now working. The first were the two laid from Valentia, Ireland, to Newfoundland, in 1866; the third was laid in 1869, from St. Pierre, France, to Duxbury, Mass.; the fourth in 1875, from Ireland to Rye, N. H., and the fifth, recently, from Brest, France, to Cape Cod, Mass.

A TRUSTING Minnesota editor moved his office into a building adjoining a church, hoping that from under the shadow of its tall spire a beneficial influence would come. Inside of a week a wind-storm blew the top off the steeple, and the only thing about his shop that was seen to come out from under the shadow was the editor himself on all fours and covered with brick, mortar and printers' ink.

THE craze for monuments has struck Elmira, where Mark Twain married his wife, and the result is a monument to Adam. Rev. Thomas K. Beecher once suggested that if Elmira wasn't the garden of Eden it ought to have been, and the whole community, being humorists, propose to raise $2,000 for a marble memorial of the father of the race, with an inscription by the only man who ever showed any sentiment over Adam. Apparently Eve is to be left to languish in forgetfulness.

A QUEER case comes from San Francisco. Mrs. A. G. Du Tour boarded with M. F. Cummins, a man who appears to be very fond of children, until her board had grown too large to settle. Cummins, it appears, proposed that Mrs. Du Tour should sell her little girl, Maud Du Tour, in consideration of a release from payment of the board. Mrs. Du Tour agreed, and not long ago little Maud was transferred to Cummins for ten years, at the end of which period she will revert to her mother.

THE country worst afflicted by carnivorous beasts and venomous reptiles in the world is India. Snakes alone in 1877 killed nearly 17,000 persons, and tigers, leopards, jackals, hyenas and other wild beasts nearly 3,000 more. Efforts were made at the same time to destroy the animals, but without much apparent reduction of the number. About 127,000 snakes and 22,000 wild beasts were killed, and $50,000 were paid in rewards for their destruction. British sportsmen have killed millions of the feline species in India, and there remain millions to kill.

AN old Bible is now in a bookstore in Albany that was picked up by a Union soldier in the streets of Fredericksburg, on Dec. 14, 1862. The soldier gave it to his chaplain, who forwarded it to Albany, and there it has been ever since. It is a Latin Bible that was printed in the year 1500. The first person of the Godhead is represented in it in the semblance of an old man with the papal crown on his head. The flood is pictured—Noah and his wife with their heads out of the window looking at the flight of four birds. Mamma is represented about the size of a bread cracker. Moses is invariably pictured as having horns.

EVERY writer has his own peculiar method of composing. Some novelists, for example, outline all the plot of a story before beginning to write; others make the opening chapters without much idea of what the end will be. Anthony Trollope does not perfect a plot beforehand, it is said, but incidents are fabricated to fit the story as it progresses. He is credited with saying: "I wrote a novel once in which a lady forged a will, but I had not myself decided that she had forged it till the chapter before that in which she confesses her guilt. I once heard an unknown critic abuse my workmanship because a certain lady had been made to appear too frequently in my pages I went home and killed her immediately."

THE little Swedish town of Nordkopping has been the scene of a very desperate duel, without seconds. Two officers of the Guards, named Ohlsson and Bostrom, were found in a room, both shot through the heart. They had been firm friends, and the mystery of their death has only been solved by letters which they wrote to their relations. It seems that one of these gentlemen, who was engaged to marry a lady of good family, had, previous to his engagement, maintained relations with a notorious woman in Stockholm. His friend rashly announced the engagement to this person, who, thereon, wrote a letter to the young lady, which made her behave with great coldness to her lover. The Guardsman found life unendurable; his friend also suffered the tortures of remorse, and they resolved to put themselves out of their pain by fighting a duel at the shortest possible distance. Bostrom shot Ohlsson through the heart, and himself was found with a bullet in his breast. But that bullet was not discharged by Ohlsson. A mark on Bostrom's forehead shows that he had been grazed by the shot of his opponent, and it is plain that, unwilling to survive his friend, he shot himself through the heart.

ZADKIEL, the British prophet, in his almanac for 1880, intimates that the stars will have more or less to do with the affairs of this country the coming year. In March, owing to some malefic conjunction of the planets, "the President will find ample scope for the exercise of all of his moderation, wisdom and patience, for politics will be very lively and embittered in America, and United States soldiers will have to take to the war-path." There will be feverish excitement in New York in May, and "the marshaling of troops will rouse the martial institutions of Republican people," this, unfortunate state of affairs being caused by "the square of Mars and Saturn." Eclipses are also to bring us bad harvests and other troubles.

THE domestic economy of Liberty Hall, the Georgia home of Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, is peculiar. It is probably the only mansion in the country where the domestic and social arrangements are entirely unaffected by the sickness or health of the master of the house. Visitors come and go, partake of his hospitality, make themselves at home, whether he be able to receive them in person or not. Almost every train that stops brings coming guests and bears away departing. Dinner is served at 1, and all who happen to be present take their places at the board. Later visitors take supper, and early ones breakfast, and the breakfast table always brings new faces. Mr. Stephens' own habit is to rise at 9, and after dressing to be rolled in his easy-chair out upon the piazza, where he usually calls for a game of whist—an amusement which has become a habit with him, and helps to solace many an hour of suffering. After an hour or two he returns to bed, and rests till dinner, when he rises and takes the head of his table, that being the only meal he takes in the dining-room. After dinner, conversation and whist are in order, and at 7 he goes to bed.

Curious Facts About Memory.

A French scientist has been studying the faculty of memory as exhibited by different races, and its relation to the other mental faculties as shown in individuals of the same race. His statements are interesting;

The inferior races of mankind, such as negroes, the Chinese, etc., have more memory than those of a high type of civilization.

Primitive races which were unacquainted with the art of writing had a wonderful memory, and were for ages in the habit of handing down, from one generation to another, hymns as voluminous as the Bible.

Prompters and professors of declamation know that women have more memory than men. French women will learn a foreign language quicker than their husbands.

Youths have more memory than adults. It is well developed in children, attains its maximum about the fourteenth or fifteenth year, and then decreases.

Feeble individuals of a lymphatic temperament have more memory than the strong. Students who obtain the prize for memory and recitation chiefly belong to the former class.

Parisian students have also less memory than those who come from the provinces. At the Ecole Normale and other schools the pupils who have the best memory are not the most intelligent.

The memory is more developed among the peasantry than among citizens, and among the clergy than among the laity.

From a physiological point of view, memory is diminished by over-feeding, by physical exercise, and by education, in this sense, that the illiterate have potentially more memory than those who know how to read and write.

We remember, moreover, better in the morning than in the evening, in the summer than in the winter, and better in warm than in cold climates.

Imprisonment for Debt.

There are three persons in Augusta (Me.) jail for debt. One is a well-dressed young man, whose father died twenty years ago leaving him an estate worth $1,000,000; the second is confined by the town of Mount Vernon for non-payment of taxes; the third refuses to pay for a newspaper which he had subscribed for and read.

JURIES sometimes give very curious verdicts. One of the most remarkable was that found by a Washoe jury in a case of milk-stealing. The prisoner was tried on a charge of stealing milk from another man's cow. It was proved that he had frequently milked the animal at night, thereby causing his neighbor great vexation and annoyance. The jury desired to express in their verdict their sense of the aggravated nature of the offense. They therefore found the prisoner "guilty of milking the cow in the first degree."

FARM NOTES.

NEW WHEAT PEST.—A correspondent of the Country Gentleman, writing from Monroe county, N. Y., states that a new insect has this fall been discovered eating the roots of the wheat-plant, an inch below the surface. As yet the damage has not been great, but the insect is more than likely to increase. Judging from the correspondent's description, the grub that does the damage has not yet been found. The plant withers and dies, and can be readily pulled up. The work seems to be similar to that done by the white grub in meadows, and may be its work.

SHORT CORN CROP.—Unless some accident happens to the growing wheat, making it necessary to plow it up next spring, the corn crop of 1880 will be a great deal smaller than the present one, even if the yield be extra good. At least one-third of the corn-fields all through the corn-belt have been sowed with wheat. The dry spring enabled farmers to put in a great deal of wet land, which is always uncertain, and a great many meadows were plowed up and planted to corn. This low ground may be too wet to plant next season; if so, the acreage will be largely reduced. We have an abiding faith in the value of the present corn crop, especially to those who are able to hold it until 1880.

"BEARING YEAR OF TREES."—The attempt to change the productive season of fruit-trees by removing the fruit-buds, appears to have been a failure. The experience of one man is thus detailed in the New York Tribune: "In an effort to change the bearing-year of an apple-tree, Mr. Robert Manning, Secretary of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, spent three days' labor in pinching off the blossoms, and got a moderate crop the following year; but the next season it returned to its habit of profuse bearing, when its blossoms were again stripped with the same round of results, exhibiting an obstinate persistency in its habit of alternate bearing. It was found that the blossoms numbered 80,000 to 100,000, or thirty to forty blossoms to one apple. At this rate it might be better to let an orchard have its own way."

PROFITS OF BEEKEEPING.—In the October number of the Beekeepers' Magazine, Mr. G. M. Doolittle, of Borodino, N. Y., gives the average yield per swarm and prices of honey, from his apiary, during the past seven years. The highest amount per hive was 167 pounds, and the lowest fifty pounds—an average, during the years mentioned, of a little over ninety pounds per stock. The average price during that time has been 21¼ cents per pound. Probably during the next seven years the average price will be much less, but the yield of honey may remain the same. Should the average price be but 12½ cents per pound, even then the proceeds from each swarm would amount to $11.25. The increase in swarms should pay the expense of hives, caring for and selling the honey. There is money in bees rightly managed.

HOPS.—"Why don't the people of this country raise more hops, and less corn?" said an Eastern man to us recently. We could only say that the climate of Central Illinois does not appear to be suited to hop culture. Our hot summers and high winds seem to detract from the quantity of the crop. The vine grows luxuriantly, but fails to "seed" heavily, as it does in a more moist climate. The present high price will probably stimulate the business, and new hands may engage in it. Perhaps, on the clay soil in the timber, hops may be made to pay. We watched carefully a ten-acre field upon an adjoining farm for several years; but the crops never paid expenses, and the field has been plowed up. Hop-roots are cheap, and isolated pieces are not likely to be troubled with lice. It is a crop that it will do to try on a small scale, but requires skill and capital to manage it rightly.—Chicago Tribune.

MORE EVIDENCE AGAINST THE SPARROW.—The English sparrow does not seem to make as much headway in the smaller towns as it does in the large cities. They do not appear to be much more numerous here than they were a year ago—a fact which we are pleased to chronicle. A correspondent of the Country Gentleman, writing from Bergen, N. J., says of them: "Here, at a distance of fifteen miles from New York city, the sparrows have become so numerous as to gather in flocks of fifty or more. Last season these pests alighted upon a piece of corn-field, tore open the ends of the ears with their strong bills, and fed upon the soft grain while it was in the milk. In this way nearly every ear over a large portion of the field was damaged before it became too hard for them to operate upon. This is a new opening for the enterprise of these vermin, which will certainly become as serious a trouble to American farmers as they have been to the English. Fortunately our severe winters will tend to thin out their numbers greatly, and it will be found a very effective remedy to refuse to feed them around our houses. It certainly seems inhuman—at least to a well-disposed person—to permit any animal to starve; but, in this case, it may, perhaps, come to be considered justifiable to treat this pest with as little compunction as we would so many rats and mice. By refraining from petting the sparrows or providing nest-boxes for them, and permitting them to take their chances with other birds, the evil will be greatly mitigated. If not, other measures should be resorted to."

WHAT NOT TO KILL.—The French Minister of Finance has caused to be published a list of animals and insects which are friends to the farmer, and deserve protection instead of destruction. The list, with some additions and amendments, applies to this country. We are in doubt whether the mole does more good than harm, and, in the case of the bird mentioned above, there are at least conflicting opinions. We give the list for what it is worth:

Hedge-hog—Lives mostly on mice, rodents, slugs, and grubs—animals hurtful to agriculture. Don't kill the hedgehog.

Toad—Farm-assistant; he destroys twenty to thirty insects per hour. Don't kill the toad.

Mole—Is continually destroying grubs, larvæ, palmer-worms, and insects injurious to agriculture. No trace of vegetation is ever found in its stomach. Don't kill the mole.

Birds—Each department loses several millions annually through insects. Birds are the only enemies able to contend against them vigorously. They are great caterpillar-killers and agricultural assistants. Children, don't disturb their nests.

Lady-bird—Never destroy, for they are the best friend of farmers and horticulturists, and their presence upon aphis-ridden plants is beneficial.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

YORKSHIRE PUDDING.—A quarter of a pound of flour, with a quart of water or milk; three eggs, well beaten, to be mixed with it; pepper and salt; butter the pan; put it under the beef so as to catch the gravy; have it in a good, big pan, so as to be thin. Cut in pieces when served with the beef, and arrange around the dish.

RASPBERRY SHRUB OR VINEGAR.—Cover raspberries (currants, gooseberries, strawberries or grapes) with vinegar; let stand a week; strain; to every pint of juice add a teacup of water; add a pint of sugar to every quart of juice; boil from fifteen to twenty minutes. This is better for the boys than ginger beer.

DUTCH ROLLS.—Sift three quarts of flour; break three eggs into a pint of cold milk, in which put a teaspoonful of yeast, and stir up; cut a spoonful of butter up fine and work it in your flour; mix the eggs and yeast with the flour; knead thoroughly. Make into rolls, butter the pan, and stand by the stove to rise. Bake in a quick oven.

LEMON JELLY.—Take a paper of gelatine and let it soak in a pint of cold water for an hour at least, but the longer it soaks the better. Then add to it a quart of boiling water, the juice of two or three lemons, and a pint and a half of sugar. Set it away, without cooking at all, in a form to cool, and an excellent article of jelly will be the result.

LEMONADE IN STORE.—Take one dozen lemons, press out the juice. Then separate the pulp from the skin, and boil the pulps for a few minutes in one pint of water. Add this water to the juice previously extracted, and strain. Put one pound of white sugar to each pint of the fluid, and boil for ten minutes. This sirup may be kept bottled for use, one table-spoonful in a glass of water making an excellent drink.

POCKET LEMONADE POWDERS.—White sugar, one pound; tartaric or citric acid, one ounce; essence of lemon, half an ounce. Mix with pestle and mortar thoroughly, and dry; do up in table-spoonful packages; when thirsty add half pint of water. The boys will like these in the corn field along with a handful of ginger-snaps, or a buttered slice of gingerbread. It makes them forget the mornings are long, and the children like to take them to school.

COLOGNE.—A fair cologne may be made as follows: Alcohol at 84 degrees, 10 quarts; dissolve in it essence of neroli, petit grain, ½ ounce; essence of rosemary, 2½ drachms; essence of lavender, 1½ drachms; essence of peppermint, ½ drachm; essence of bergamot, 12½ drachms; essence of portugae, 7½ drachms; tincture of benzoin, 1½ drachms; essence of lemon, 12½ drachms.

RICE PUDDING.—One heaping teacupful of rice, one pint of water. Boil the rice and water until the water is evaporated; then add one pint of milk, a lump of butter the size of an egg. Take five eggs; use the yelks, which beat up with the grated rinds of two lemons; add this to the rice, with two teacupfuls of white sugar. Butter the dish, and bake slowly. With the whites beat up light two table-spoonfuls of powdered sugar and the juice of the two lemons. When the pudding is baked put on this frosting, and let the rice pudding warm.

CREAM DRESSING.—When oil is disliked in salads, the following dressing will be found excellent: Rub the yelks of two hard-boiled eggs very fine with a spoon; incorporate with them a dessert-spoonful of mixed mustard; then stir in a table-spoonful of melted butter, half a teacupful of thick cream, a saltspoonful of salt, and cayenne pepper enough to take up on the point of a very small pen knife-blade, and a few drops of anchovy or Worcestershire sauce; and, very carefully, sufficient vinegar to reduce the mixture to a smooth, creamy consistency, and pour it upon lettuce carefully prepared for the table.

Mother and Child.

A woman who lives in Ashville, Ala., writes to the Aegis, of that place, of the miraculous rescue of her little 3-year-old boy from drowning. The child fell down a well, the dark depth of which was thirty feet. The mother saw him go down. She says: "On reaching the well I was just in time to see him rise to the top of the water. I was alone, save three other little children, whom I sent for help. I had, amid all the anguish of my soul, presence of mind enough to let the bucket down and tell him to take hold of it, which he did. After some minutes he let loose from weakness, sank again, except his little head. I lowered the bucket lower, telling him to take hold of the rope. He ran his hand through a ring tied on for the purpose of sinking the bucket, and caught the bail, and there he held on for one and a half hours, begging me all the time in his baby talk to come down and help him out. I would say: 'Hold on, Bobbie.' 'I will,' he would reply. At length a lady came to my assistance, and we took a rope and made a noose on the end of it, and, letting it down, told him what to do. He put his foot through the noose and drew it up around his knee. I asked him if he could hold on. He said he could hold on to the bucket, 'Daw me out.' He holding the rope around his leg, I telling him not to let go, we drew him up until I could reach his little shivering hands. Thus I saved my little baby from drowning. Safe to my breast I clasped his little shivering body, and praised God for His mercies."

THE PREHISTORIC UTE.

An Interesting Tradition as to Their Early History.

[From the Denver News.]

It seems that after all the Utes are not entirely devoid of imagination. George West tells a remarkable story about them, which he alleges was related to him by a Ute named Pah-goo. They call the Colorado river the Toom-pinto-weep, where Pah-goo says there is a deep old river bed, fully half a mile deep. Pah-goo says his forefathers had a tradition that, long years ago, they had lived near a vast warm lake north-east of the Big river; that the country was warm, full of big trees and big deer, and big oxen with white horns; that big fishes and snakes as long as a hundred lodge poles abounded in this lake; that one day all the big oxen began to roar together, and that they raised such a steam from their nostrils that the earth reeled and the sun was obscured; that suddenly the lake fell and continued falling for three moons, and then became so much reduced that they knew it not any more, but that the big lake they found had been drained away to the south, and that its warm waters had cut through the mountains, the present canon of Green river and of the Big river (the Colorado); and that this old bed in the Toom-pinto-weep is where the lake waters were drained. He also said that the story goes on that all the big deer and the big oxen with white horns strayed away eastward, and all perished in the mountains from cold or by the arrows of the Ute hunters; that soon after a big flood formed Grand River canon, and after this flood came a small race of people who had skin canoes, and who brought seed corn of a small kind, called in Spanish chiquito mays; that these people were almost white, and that they taught the Utes how to make good bows and spears and earthenware; that they built stone houses in the cliffs, and cultivated pumpkins, corn and beans; that they had silver and gold in abundance, and iron tools that they had obtained in the high mountains to the northeast; that afterward, from the northwest, big red Indians came over to this country and killed and drove off the little people, who finally all went south, as well as the big red men, who are the Apaches, Navajoes and Kiowas. He also said that the big oxen with white horns, the grande lagarios (probably alligators), were found down among the Apache and Navajo Indians, but that by-and-by the country became drier and cooler, and the Utes only were left on the Big river and its branches; that melted rocks were poured out everywhere and left the country desolate, and that the little people had told his forefathers that where they came from were big waters, and in these waters were men with bodies like a fish. Old Pah-goo said that in this river-bed there is plenty of gold, but that it is sure death for any one to go into the canon to get it.

Esculapius Euchered.

A rich story of a confidence game played upon a leading physician of Rockford by Chicago sharps has just come out. The doctor was a little shy about telling his neighbors of his adventure, but finally disclosed the facts to Marshal Sully. A short time since the gentleman, whom we will call Dr. G., started for Michigan, intending to cross the lake by steamer from Chicago. While he was waiting about the landing for the boat, a man accosted him with a hearty, "How do you do, Dr. Hallowell?" at the same time extending an eager hand for a shake. "You have the start of me," replied the doctor, "but you have made a mistake in my name. I am Dr. G., of Rockford." "Precisely, precisely. I recognize it now; strange that I should have made such a mistake! Well, how are times out in Rockford?" It was the same old dodge, but the doctor didn't see it. Just at the moment when the doctor had so very explicitly given his name and residence, another man slid on the scene, and was surprised and delighted to see Dr. G, of Rockford, and, after going through a vigorous pump-handle movement for a few moments, the three settled down to a friendly chat. The doctor felt warm and comfortable at heart because he had been so easily noticed in the great metropolis, and his good nature flowed forth. In the course of the conversation, one of the sudden acquaintances remarked to the doctor: "Dr. G., aren't you losing something out of your pocket-book?" The doctor spasmodically put his hand to his breast-pocket and drew out his wallet to see if it was all right. In an instant one of the men snatched it and ran away. The other looked in blank astonishment, and cursed the villain who would take the advantage of friendship like that, and then bustled off in pretended pursuit of the robber. The whole thing then began to dawn on the doctor. He had been the victim of a confidence game. His loss was only $75, but the wound to his vanity was worth $1,000. He hurried to a store where he had an acquaintance and, hastily relating the circumstance, asked his friend to go with him and apprehend the thief. But he was only laughed at. The doctor was so discouraged at this adventure that he returned home and did not go to Michigan, as he had intended.—Rockford (Ill.) Cor. Chicago Times.

Cuticular Transplantation.

Two or three months ago the scalp of Ellen Belcher, a Brooklyn factory girl, was torn from her head, her hair, which hung down her back, having been caught by some revolving machinery. The mutilation was frightful. At the Hospital of St. Catherine the scalp was replaced temporarily, but when Miss Belcher had regained control of her nerves a physician began the process of transplanting skin to take the place of the scalp. Minute islands of skin, including the papillary layer of the true skin, were snipped off with a pair of curved scissors from other parts of her body and planted. Bits were also cut from the arms of the girl's sisters, and from some of the sisters of the hospital. In four days the transplanted skin began to grow. It will be three years, if not longer, before the scalp can heal completely, however, and hair will never grow again. This interesting case of what surgeons call "cuticular transplantation" suggests the humorous possibility that all the negroes might be grafted into Caucasians, and thus settle the exodus business.

A 3-YEAR-OLD child of George Zuener, a resident of Hicksville, L. I., while sleeping in its crib in the room with its parents, was smothered to death by the family cat, which was found asleep lying across the face of the child.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE COCKBURN has another of his many attacks of ulcerated sore throat, and his physician has advised him strongly to retire from the bench, but he said he was determined to die in harness. He is now 77 years old.

JOHN BRIGHT, who reads a good poem every night before he goes to bed, says that of late years he has been compelled to confine himself to American writers, English poets having become too obscure, finical and affected to suit him.

THE reading-room of the British Museum contains three miles of book-cases eight feet high. The dome whence the electric light irradiates the vast room is, next to that of the Pantheon at Rome, the largest extant.

THE Mississippi, despite its greatness, is a fickle stream. Many a thriving town established upon its banks has been deserted by its creators and left far inland, and now it begins to look as though Helena, Ark., was about to share a similar fate, by the receding of the river and its cutting away a new channel.

PRUSSIA has eighteen prisons for tramps and vagrants. In 1874 there were 4,000 commitments to these institutions, but the number has increased every year, and for 1878 was 9,000. Of these, 8,000 were men and 1,000 women. They cost the country $650,000, but earned while in durance $275,000.

DON CARLOS has not, as alleged, been expelled, but has been told that, if he continued to travel about France for the purpose of demonstrations, he would incur that penalty. He thereupon repaired to England, but this was under a previous arrangement, and returns to Paris in a few weeks, when he will doubtless show that he has profited by the warning.

THE National Volunteer Soldiers' Home, in the State of Maine, located at Togus, comprises four large brick buildings about 150 feet long, sixty feet wide and three stories high. The hospital is near the barracks, and, like the main buildings, is built of brick. The highest number of inmates last winter was 1,198, while in summer they dwindle down to 500 or 600, the balance obtaining furloughs and securing work.

BARON ROTHSCHILD, of Vienna, has a favorite horse, for whose accommodation he has had a special loose box built at the cost of $12,000. This elegant room forms part of a new stable, which cost $80,000, and which has marble floors; encaustic tiles painted by distinguished artists; rings, chains and drain-traps of silver, and walls frescoed with splendid hunting scenes from the pencils of eminent animal painters. The Baron's annual income is fortunately $1,600,000.

THE Newland oak is forty-seven feet six inches in girth. The Cowthorp, now more than 100 years in process of decay, has a girth of sixty feet. Both are in England. Many of the fine oaks in England are, without doubt, from 800 to 1,000 years old. The Dukeries, in Nottinghamtoh, present the gaeatest number of specimens, and Berkshire can show some remarkably fine oaks, especially the neighborhood of Windsor, and the Duke of Buccleuch's park of Ditton, near there.

A VERY much inebriated fellow stands at the edge of the sidewalk and looks doubtfully at the crowd of carriages. Near him stands an extremely venerable and dignified old gentleman, who, after looking on awhile, kindly takes the younger man by the arm and helps him across the street. When he is safe on the other sidewalk he blurts out with tipsy gratitude: "Thank you! You know what it is to be drunk yourself."

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, DEC. 4, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY
EDITORS.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

"NO SOLID SOUTH, NO SOLID NORTH, BUT A SOLID UNION."

We owe our readers an apology for the lack of editorial matter in this issue. Several articles are deferred for want of space.

"A California paper is trying to prove that General Grant is losing his mind," says the Lagrange Standard. But this is hardly probable, considering that it is a very hard matter to get blood out of a turnip.

Hayes urges congress to authorize the secretary of the treasury to suspend the coinage of silver dollars, and insists that the issue of legal tender paper money, "is without warrant in the constitution, and a violation of sound financial principles." In other words, he chooses to allow foreign countries to dictate a gold basis for America, the most powerful country in the world, rather than have America demand recognition for her silver. Hayes worships gold and national banks, so does the bondholding aristocracy of this country.

Last Monday was the last day of Mr. B. F. Blair's term as county commissioner. It is said by those who are acquainted with the history of the county, that Mr. Blair was one of the most active and industrious officials that ever served the people. His open and fearless advocacy of public improvement made him popular with all enterprising citizens who take pride in the reputation of their county, and the good appearance of county property. He had a mind of his own, and acted according to his own dictates upon all questions of public improvement, as all business men ought to do.

The supreme court of this state will probably be called upon to decide the right of sheriffs to charge mileage from the county seat to the residence of each witness, both going and returning. The sheriff of Bartholomew county subpœnaed a number of witnesses in a single case in the same locality, some distance from the county seat, and charged mileage for such service, making, as he construed the new fee bill, a little over $80 for one day's ride, while the judge held that mileage could only be charged for the distance actually traveled, which would only amount to $6 or $8. The question has been raised in at least three counties in this state, and the court has twice held that under the provisions of the new fee and salary bill, the sheriff was entitled to full mileage going and returning for every witness subpoenaed.

General Jeff. C. Davis, who died at the Palmer House in Chicago, last Sunday afternoon, of pneumonia, was a man of much prominence in Indiana. He was born at Memphis, Clarke county, Ind., fifty-two years ago, and resided there until the outbreak of the Mexican war, when he enlisted as a private in the second Indiana regiment, and served with distinction. He was given a lieutenant's commission in the regular army in consideration of his bravery, and retained that position until the rebellion broke out. He served as colonel of an Indiana regiment for a time, and afterward was commissioned as a brigadier general. He killed General Thomas Nelson, in Louisville, during the rebellion, as the result of a quarrel. Since the war he has been constantly in the service, and at the time of his death was colonel of the Eighteenth regiment, United States army, now in the Indian territory. His remains were brought to Indiana for burial.

Thieves and Murderers Make a Raid on Spencerville.

We have been unable to get the particulars of the daring attempt to murder and rob Mr. Sol. Barney, at his residence in Spencerville, about one o'clock last Tuesday morning. Rumor has it that four men broke open the door of Mr. Barney's residence, and by so doing aroused the inmates from their slumbers, and being met by Mr. Barney the robbers fired four shots at him, neither taking effect. One report says that Barney fired four shots at the robbers, another that Mrs. Barney fired five shots, another that Mr. Erick who was sleeping in the house, was so much excited that he fired one shot before getting out of bed, and that was probably the discharge that drove the murderers out without accomplishing their object; at any rate there must have been considerable promiscuous shooting going on, if all reports are true. Prior to the attempt to rob Mr. Barney the thieves had appropriated Dr. J. Emanuel's fine carriage, horses and harness, and had everything in readiness to escape with the money (about $2,500) which they supposed Mr. Barney had taken with him from the store the evening before. Failing to secure the money, the desperadoes drove the team to a point near Butler, where the Spencervillians found it hitched to a fence, next morning about daylight. So endeth the first chapter.

A GOOD SHOWING FOR INDIANA.

Comprehensive Summary of Her Resources and Prospects.

The Relation Between the Bar and Rights of Property and Person.

[Ft. Wayne Sentinel.]

Judge Lowry, in the opening portion of his recent address as president of the Indiana State Bar Association, thus asked and answered in part the question:

"What is the need, utility and mission of the legal profession in Indiana and the benefit to be derived from organized association on the part of its members?"

Let us briefly and somewhat practically consider.

Indiana adopted her constitution as an organized state on the 29th of June 1816, and was admitted to the Union by act of congress on Dec. 11 of the same year. In 1810 she had a population of 24,520, and, according to the next succeeding census, in 1820, a population of 147,178. Assuming the same percentage of increase in population between 1870 and 1880 as there was between 1860 and 1870, she will have within her borders in 1880, 2,100,796 souls. She has an area of 33,809 square miles, or 21,637,700 acres. The assessed value of her real estate in 1878 was $629,930,057, and of personalty $215,829,988, making a total of $855,760,045. She is in the order of population the sixth state in magnitude in the American Union. Of the great coal field extending also into Illinois and Kentucky, over 6,000 square miles are within her limits, of which latter a large portion is composed of the valuable fossil or block coal, so valuable in metallurgy. She is still enriched with large tracts of forest timber, including hickory, ash, poplar and black walnut. Of her entire area there are over 7,000,000 acres of land under cultivation, and 11,000,000 or 12,000,000 of acres, improved and divided into farms of an average of 112 acres each. The value of her farm, forest and market-garden products, in 1870, including stock, living and slaughtered, and improvements, was $159,132,500, and of manufactured products, $108,617,278, making a total of $267,769,786. In 1880, it is probably safe to say the census will show an increase of at least one-fourth, thus making a total annual production of $384,712,233. There are in the state some 30 cities, varying in population from 3,000 to 90,000. In these and some of the towns are located 94 national and 150 private banks, the former having a circulation of $15,000,000, and the latter a capital of $5,000,000, and deposits of $10,000,000. Of the 65,757 miles of telegraph lines in the United States in 1873, Indiana had 6,943, or, in round numbers, 7,000; in 1877 there were 94,714 miles in the United States; and, now that there are in all probability 100,000 miles in the United States, it is fair to assume that this increase of lines gives Indiana now about 10,000 miles. She has 150 or more foreign insurance companies doing business with her citizens, which, excluding domestic companies, have a premium collection of, in round numbers, a million and a quarter of dollars, and schedule about three-quarters of a million of losses annually. She had, in the incipiency of her commercial traffic, splendid, though now extinct, lines of canals, one of which connects the great chain of northern lakes and the rivers and Gulf of St. Lawrence with the great "Father of Waters" and the Gulf of Mexico, and was the longest in existence. She still has the fine navigable waters of the Ohio extending along her entire southern boundary. Her geographical position is such as renders it necessary for nearly the whole of the traffic and intercommunication between the manufacturing regions of the east, with the great mineral and agricultural regions west of the territory to pass over it, and her magnificent lines of railway now measure within a fraction of 4,000 miles; and traverse, with the exception of three or four, every county in the state. These instrumentalities combined, amongst other causes, with the fertility of her soil and the energy and industry of her people, have contributed to the building up of a vast trade between our own citizens, and between them and those of other states, rivaling in its character and extent many of the busiest of her sister commonwealths, and surpassing many a community elsewhere venerable for its centuries of growth, emulated for the successful development of its industrial resources, and reverenced for the morality of its commercial ethics. As a corollary of all this, it is to be expected that, in addition to the immense number of persons in the state engaged in agriculture,—being at this time about 300,000; in trade and commerce, about 50,000; as laborers, about 50,000; as domestic servants, about 30,000—there will be found in such a community, as a necessary and indispensable part of it, those devoted to other pursuits than the actual manipulation of matter or of the actual physical production of commodities and the increase of values. We have, hence, a body of so-called professional men, notably clergymen, educators, physicians and surgeons, and last, but not least, lawyers. Their numbers in the state in 1860, being the period of the last authentic data, were: Of clergymen 1,787 of teachers 5,018, of physicians and surgeons 3,618, and of lawyers 1,685, which latter have now probably increased to 2,500 or 3,000. Very many worthy people feel fully persuaded that this latter class, and possibly all courts, might be very profitably to the public, and to their own great comfort entirely dispensed with. [Laughter.] So with the ancient and ingenuous, if not ingenious beldame. She thought the world would have been made happier for all if there had been no men in it. [Laughter.] But all history teaches otherwise. The question is not one open to discussion. The vast and diversified interests of a people possessed of all the magnificent, rapidly developed resources, and environed by all the wonderful surroundings I have enumerated, must have guarantees of protection from the aggressions of others and of each other, and rights of person and of reputation must be held sacred and inviolable against the evil passions of the heedless and depraved, and the ruthless, ruffian hand of violence. How shall this be accomplished but by availing ourselves of the instrumentalities which the combined experience of the past has pointed out? That experience has been placed in the crucible, and from it has been extracted and eliminated a multitude of principles, deemed by the most illustrious of mankind fitted for the guidance and government of organized society. Their proper application requires the existence of tribunals. And when it is understood of what an infinitude of rules and their exceptions, a system woven together with a view to its being adapted to the infinitely diversified, ever-changing and kaleidoscopic aspects of human affairs is necessarily composed, it will be understood, also, how necessary it is to have those fitted by their learning and familiarized by their industry with the facts in each particular case, so as to aid the tribunals in applying to each peculiar combination of circumstances the opposite deduction from the teachings of experience formulated into what is called a rule of law or equity, and thus work out the great end to be kept always in view, the unerring enforcement of even handed justice. You here assembled are of those who sit in these tribunals and minister in their portals and at their altars. Your present mission is well summarized in the constitution of this body. It is "to promote mutual acquaintance and harmony," "to maintain a high standard of professional integrity, honor and courtesy; to encourage a thorough and liberal education; to give expression to the deliberate and well-considered opinion of the legal profession upon matters wherein its members may properly act as a body; to assist in the improvement of the laws and the better administration of justice to all classes." These will be admitted on all hands to be most laudable objects.

The president continued his address by giving a brief resume of the associations of the bar for kindred purposes in England, Scotland, France and other nations in Europe, and by enlarged comments on the excellencies and defects of the profession and the law, and concluded with an appeal for the still higher development and improvement of both.

EDUCATIONAL COLUMN.

By Prof. W. H. MacIntosh.

SCHOLARSHIP IN TEACHING.

The term "teacher," implies knowledge combined with ability to communicate it. The people acknowledge the fact that there are pretended teachers by a law that creates an office, and demands a test of ability.

There are many people of excellent judgment who think that, considering the little effort and cost most applicants for schools put forth, the few days they have to work and the brief period of six hours a day that they are on duty, teachers are well paid for their services —that is, the "common run" of teachers.

The poorest teachers are sometimes the most exacting; they are the ones who exhibit surprise that they are not marked up among the eighties in examination; that want their fires kindled and their rooms swept for them, and call classes to profitless recitation, or at close of day, dismiss at a word a noisy, wrangling throng.

Differences of opinion expressed with energy attract attention and people take sides; opportunity is given, results are observed, and judgment is rendered.

Power is temporarily held by the public officer, but its permanence rests with the people, and any lasting improvement must have their approval and support. As superintendent of schools, it has been my plan for the last six months to stimulate by professional pride, by fear of failure and by holding out hopes of longer terms and better wages, old teachers and new aspirants to improve their scholarship. To a certain extent, the attempt has been successful, but obstacles have arisen which if not removed will undo the work, throw wide open the door to the flood of waste-wood and drift, and render the superintendency a useless office.

If all who ask licenses are to have them, regardless of knowledge, does it not strike men of good sense that examinations are foolish performances? If a superintendent acts from personal motives, from desire to favor, or effort to be popular and to have the least possible trouble, is he not a useless officer?

The facts are that a rigid, honest, impartial discharge of duty by a superintendent, strikes dismay among those who know they are often as ignorant as those they would assume to teach; parents who never see the inside of a school-room in school-time, think the officer had better "hold on;" people of districts circulate petitions that some favorite, incompetent, be permitted to impose upon their children, and resentment sullen or loud-mouthed is expressed against a system which calls, really calls scholarship in question. Some have scholarship and no government, others have government and no scholarship, and many have neither,—the last named are the worst lot.

Good morals and good manners are more valuable than scholarship, but education is not complete without all three. We cannot know whether a teacher is at heart good or bad by examination of written answers, but we can tell whether he is capable of writing a sentence correctly, spelled upon a board, or speaking grammatically.

It is, therefore, required as a basis of qualification, that all who assume to be teachers shall know something of what they are to teach. If there are those who once knew something and have since forgotten it, the misfortune is theirs, and an experience gained by sufferance and continued by virtue of that same experience, had better terminate or recollection and progression come into active service. There are quack doctors who have killed more than they have cured, and there are novices who render essential service in restoring the sick; so there are quack teachers, not always the purest in morals or best in manners, who have murdered the innocents for years and have never been arrested by the outraged public; and there are young teachers who are an honor to their noble occupation. Past services should be considered when observation has learned that those services have been valuable, but the custom which requires servants to bring a character from their latest employer, is a good thing, too, in education.

Personal feelings should yield to general good, and the people would better the chances of their moneys being expended with profit to their children, if they would quietly acquiesce in the decision which declares the young man or young woman of their choice incapable.

The best of teachers would fail in a district where the people felt displeasure at the rejection of their selection, and an incompetent would have a great help in the united support of the householders, but the best results would come from the teaching of a qualified person, heartily seconded by the parents in his efforts to make their school one of the best.

A gentleman of age and experience lately said to me: "Is it not the only way to sift the teachers and license about enough to fill the schools, taking some poor ones, but only as a matter of necessity?" Another said: "It seems that you prefer that there should be no school in some houses, rather than have poor schools."

Would it not be better for children not to be taught at all, rather than that the teaching should be wrong?

Recently a young man was licensed on a grade just the minimum, on the assurance that the district had voted him in unanimously. One man said: "Our school is very backward and does not require much education on the part of a teacher," and I told him that it probably never would. The fact is, the backward schools should have the best teachers, and soon they would come up in line with the rest. Strangely enough, many persons, jealous of their rights, yearly permit their children to be kept in school by "frauds," while their next district neighbors have the best of teachers.

Lately I learned that a young man desirous of improving his knowledge of grammar, concluded to attend school, and the first day saw the teacher write so faulty a sentence upon the board, that he took his books and left, saying that "he knew better than that himself," and that teacher can now go blundering on till the close of his term.

Some say, "Refuse our teacher if you must, but provide a substitute at once, so that our schools may go on;" but the superintendent does not run a normal school, and does not act as an agent in providing teachers. He has enough to do to test scholarship and to observe the practicable labors of those he deems half-way competent. It will wound no sensibilities to note here a few errors taken from the many in a single paper prepared on grammar, by a young man whom a district was urgent to have teach its school. The plural of stratum was given, "stratum;" of radius, "radias" and of axis, "axis';" sentence was spelled, "centance;" difference, "diference;" preposition, "prepposition," and in history, Henry Clay was assigned a cabinet position during the first term of George Washington.

The schools are in the main supplied with teachers, and the great majority of them are qualified. In some districts the teachers are an honor to the profession, and the people are fortunate indeed in having their services. In others, there will be little order, less study and least instruction. It is cheering to enter, for instance, such a school as that taught by S. M. High, at No. 6, Jackson township. He combines scholarship with admirable methods of instruction, and his easy control is full of kindness. He opens the school at 8:50 each morning by reading a chapter from the bible; upon the black-board is the daily routine of classes, these come and go with careful tread by signal. The teacher speaks little, in low tones and to a purpose, and at noon-time dinner is taken at seats, and orderly. There are many such schools in DeKalb county, and there are many where there are no opening exercises, where children flock to classes with heavy tread, have indiscriminate recess, and eat their lunch standing, with hats on around the stove. To secure the best teachers and to have a good school in every district, is well worthy of effort, and to this end we ask the co operation of all parents and friends of education, primarily in securing for teachers such only as have scholarship enhanced in value by power to control and influence, and ultimately to encourage them by sending children regularly, promptly, with approved text books, and occasionally dropping in to see how the work goes on.

Mr. John Shoub entered upon the discharge of his duties as county commissioner, on Tuesday morning last. The board was reorganized by the election of George H. Duncan, president. We feel certain that Messrs Duncan, Kelham and Shoub will guard the interests of the county as they would their personal affairs, and that the citizens of DeKalb will have no occasion to regret the election of the present board.

—It gives us pleasure to announce to announce that Mrs. E. D. Hartman has returned from Chicago, considerably improved in health.

—Johnnie Schaab and his new wife recently made an abbreviated visit in Ft. Wayne and New Haven, leaving last Friday and returning Monday.

—Mr. W. C. Fluke, of Clayton, Mich. is calling upon his old friends and acquaintances in Auburn this week. He never forgets his annual visit to the Courier office.

—Our subscribers will oblige us by paying their subscription as soon as convenient. We want the money to pay our debts, a "power press" is a secondary consideration.

—The Fort Wayne, Jackson and Saginaw railroad was sold yesterday, Mr. James F. Joy, of Detroit, buying the road in for the stockholders. It will continue under the old management.

—The lecture delivered at the M. E. church last night was very interesting to the large audience in attendance. Col. Birtsollo understands the "arts and mysteries of Egypt," as connected with Masonry.

—List of unclaimed letters remaining in the postoffice at Auburn, Ind., Dec. 1st, 1879. W. Bride, Mrs. W. Brown, Sam Horn, Sarah Marts, Mary Moor, S. N. Persom, John Smith, A. H. Smith.
Jos. Rainier, P. M.

—The handsome, dashing Tommy Waters, a favorite traveling salesman in the house of R. & J. Cummings, of Toledo, was a distinguished guest at the Neoteric's hop Friday night. Tom is popular everywhere, and oh, how he does love to dance!

—It is now positively asserted, by those who ought to know, that Dan Hickey, that Ft. Wayne Jackson & Saginaw track smasher, will soon have somebody to help him while away the cold dreary nights of winter.

—Miss Dora McBride severed her connection with Hollister's restaurant last Saturday, and the vacancy was filled by her sister, Miss Mary. She left because—no, we'll not tell it; but a continuation of this item will be found in a subsequent issue.

—Miss Alice Clark is prepared to do all kinds of knitting. Ladies' and children's hose, gentlemen's half-hose, and mittens of all sizes made to order. Residence at the corner of Jackson and Eleventh streets, Auburn, Indiana. 47-3w.

—Mike Long—Auburn's Mike—who was lately appointed postal clerk on the L. S. & M. S. railroad, between Chicago and Toledo, is at home this week. He says he likes it first rate, only the night work is rather tough; but he gets one week on and the next off, and this is one of his "off" weeks.

—Miss Metta Ferris, for two weeks past a welcome visitor in Auburn, the guest of her sister, Mrs. F. P. Copper, leaves to-day for her home in Fostoria, Ohio, taking with her the best wishes of the numerous friends she has made during her too transient sojourn amongst us.

—A disturbance occurred near Dave McNabb's heading-factory, at the junction last Saturday night, in which a grocery keeper of that vicinity figures more prominently than creditably. Drawing knives on people is a rather dangerous pastime, and our advice to him is a little more caution in the use of such weapons.

—George Hazzard forfeited his bond in each of the three cases in the Steuben circuit court on change of venue from this county. The bond in each case is $1,000. Now, if the citizens of Auburn who are interested in the prosecution of Hazzard, will stay by Messrs. Hench, Adams and Moody, they will yet have the satisfaction of seeing Hazzard landed in the penitentiary.

—Frank Copper and Fred. Clark, accompanied by Mrs. Copper, Miss Ferris and a quill-shover on the Courier, visited the jail last Tuesday. They were ushered in by the sheriff's wife, Mrs. A. S. Leas, and found everything, as usual, in "apple-pie order"—except one crazy man who was singing a dirge. Our jail is a model of neatness, and we are proud of it.

—Somebody has got after "Rural," our last week's correspondent from Cupp's Corners, and he should be on his guard at all times, for the following was received in a lady's hand-writing:

"Editors Courier:—We think Bro. Rural made an ass of himself corresponding from Cupp's Corners and reporting the golden wedding. Make a few more corrections and then blow your big nose, Bro. Rural."

Jack Swain, who was recently tried in Fort Wayne for the murder committed on the fair grounds, July 4th last, and who has lain in jail for five months, was released on $5,000 bail last Tuesday. Popular opinion is in his favor, and his final release has been the occasion of great rejoicing by friends and relatives. He must hold himself in readiness for another trial, however, at any time, in accordance with the terms of his bond.

—We are asked why the secretary's proceedings of the institute at Garrett were not published in the Republican. We answer, because they were not furnished us. Prof. McIntosh tells us that the manuscript was furnished to Baxter, who was "instructed" to furnish printed slips to county papers, but Baxter furnished all other papers but the Republican, showing that this paper is the only one he considers a rival. This is the reason, friends, why the proceedings did not appear last week.—Republican.

A poor excuse is better than none. The Courier was the only paper in the county that published the full proceedings of the institute, and the names of teachers in attendance. As to the "rival" business, Bro Baxter, of the Press, can speak for himself.

Educational Items.

The first township institute of the year will be held at Corunna, next Saturday, the 6th, inst. Trustees Jordan and Reinoehl, both excellent school men, unite in calling this institute for the benefit of Richland and Fairfield teachers. A programme has been arranged, exercises prepared and an address will be delivered by the county superintendent.

The superintendent is visiting the schools of Richland township this week; next week he will visit the schools of Keyser township, and the following week he will be in Butler township. A detailed account of the visits of the superintendent will be published from week to week, and teachers will do well to see that their school-room is neat, order good, lessons learned and pupils industrious and mannerly.

The trustees of the several townships will accompany the superintendent and note the use or neglect of apparatus, the needs of the teacher, and the extent to which children are supplied with books and slate.

A call-bell, a thermometer, a programme and a small clock are not costly, and will be a great assistance to teachers and pupils. Children like to know how time goes, as well as their elders, and clocks are cheap gratifications.

TOOTHPICKS FROM TURKEY,

Culled from Last Thursday's Doings.

Rev. H. J. Norris thanksgave in Ft. Wayne.

Frank Copper cleaned off his end of the table at the ladies' supper.

Lives there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said,
"Dog my cats if I haven't eaten too much gobbler again!"

Coop. Ralston can surround more turkey, oysters, biscuits, pie, pickles, bread, cranberry-sauce and cake, and do it in less time, than any three small boys in DeKalb county.

Notwithstanding the dismal weather, there were crowds of people at the Presbyterian ladies' dinner and supper, and many an aching void was filled to overflowing for only twenty-five cents.

The Courier editors are indebted to Rev. H. Johnson for "comps" to the big dinner, but every man in the establishment bought his big supper like a little man. This accounts for the receipts being so large.

Among the ladies who acted in the role of pretty waiter girls at the thanksgiving dinner and supper, were Mrs. Birdsell and Mrs. Osgood, and Misses Sadie Hare, Mollie Sprott and Frankie Ryan; and they "did it up brown," to the satisfaction of everybody.

Dr. T. J. Dills, of Fort Wayne, commissioner Blair, J. W. Dills and family, of Spencerville, Deputy-Sheriff Somers and wife, and Miss Annice Russell, of this place, comprised a little party who helped to destroy turkey and pumpkin pie at the residence of W. H. Dills and lady.

The receipts at the dinner and supper rooms on Thursday last were $68, gross, and the expenses being $11.25, leaves a net profit of $56.75 for the Presbyterian church, and the ladies of the church are particularly entitled to credit, inasmuch as the success of it is due to their untiring efforts.

One sly old coon at the supper table did his level best to give thanks by getting away with everything he could reach, and he came near bankrupting the whole institution. Our Jack undertook to eat a race with him, but was distanced on the first heat. When we left, after spending an hour or more—also 25 cents—the old rascal had just tackled the table-cloth.

Amos Miller didn't thanksgive at his home in Hicksville, his in-Kline-ation to visit Auburn being as strong as ever; but he knocked around looking for somebody so long that he nearly missed connection on his dinner. He made up for lost time, however, when he got there, as could be observed by the station he took behind a stack of turkey and mashed potatoes.

Butler

During a half-day's visit in Butler last week, the writer had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of a number of our subscribers, among whom are some of the best citizens of that enterprising burg. We say enterprising, because the crowded streets and stores indicate that Butler is second to no place in the county as a trading point. Our space will not allow an extended notice of the several branches of business so ably represented, but we take pleasure in referring to that branch which is considered the leading feature in every town, i. e. the hotel. We venture the assertion that no town or city in Indiana, not excepting Indianapolis, can boast of a hotel as well furnished throughout as the Boots House, in Butler. The gentlemanly proprietor, Mr. Geo. E. Boots, (who by the way, is one of the most obliging landlords we ever met,) invited us to take a look through the house, and stopping at the first room we came to, which had the appearance of a bridal chamber, we supposed of course he was showing the best room first in order to create a good first impression, but as we passed from room to room through the entire house and found every room furnished in grand style, we concluded that the wide-spread reputation of the Boots House was well merited. Mr. Boots is also the owner and manager of the Commercial House, located a short distance from the depot, which he uses for lodging purposes when the palatial headquarters are full. For first class accommodations, good meals, entertaining landlord and gentlemanly clerks, we commend the Boots House.

Pause, Ponder and Peruse.!

The invention of that Superior and Complete Sewing Machine (The Family Sewing Machine), marks one of the most important eras in the history of machinery and when we consider its great usefulness and extremely low price ($25). it is very difficult to conceive of any invention for domestic use of more or even equal importance to families. It has great capacity for work; beautiful, smooth, and quiet movement, rapid execution, certainty and delightful ease of operation, that at once commends it above all others The working parts are all steel, strong and durable, and will last a life time; the bobbins hold 100 yards of thread; the stitch is the firmest of all the stitches made, neat and regular, and can be regulated in a moment to sew stitches from an inch in length on coarse material down to the finest, so infinitesimal as to be hardly discernable with the naked eye, and with a rapidity rendering it impossible to count them as fast as made; it has more attachments than any other, and it does to perfection all kinds of heavy, coarse, plain, fine, or fancy needle-work with ease, and far less labor than required on other machines. It needs no commendation, the rapid sales, increasing demand and voluntary encomiums from the press, and the thousands of families who use them, amply testify to their undoubted worth as a standard and reliable household necessity, extending its popularity each day. Machines sent anywhere to be examined before any money is paid. Agents wanted by the Company, Address them for information. Family Sewing Machine Co., 755 Broadway, New York. 43-1y.

THE IRON PEN.

[Made from a fetter of Bonnivard, the Prisoner of Chillon; the handle of wood, from the frigate Constitution and bound with a circlet of gold, inset with three precious stones from Siberia, Ceylon and Maine.]

I thought this pen would arise
From the casket where it lies—
Of itself would arise, and write
My thanks and my surprise.

When you gave it me under the pines,
I dreamed these gems from the mines
Of Siberia, Ceylon and Maine
Would glimmer as thoughts in the lines:

That this iron link from the chain
Of Bonnivard might retain
Some verse of the poet who sang
Of the prisoner and his pain;

That this wood from the frigate's mast
Might write me a rhyme at last,
As it used to write on the sky
The song of the sea and the blast.

But motionless as I wait,
Like a Bishop lying in state,
Lies the pen, with its miter of gold,
And its jewels inviolate.

Then must I speak, and say
That the light of that summer day
In the garden under the pines
Shall not fade and pass away.

I shall see you standing there,
Caress-ed by the fragrant air,
With the shadow on your face,
And the sunshine on your hair.

I shall hear the sweet low tone
Of a voice before unknown,
Saying, "this is from me to you—
From me, and to you alone."

And in words not idle and vain shall answer, and thank you again
For the gift, and the grace of the gift,
O beautiful Helen of Maine!

And forever this gift will be
As a blessing from you to me,
As a drop of the dew of your youth
On the leaves of an aged tree.

—Henry W. Longfellow, in Harper's Magazine.

MASTERED BY PASSION.

Aunt Annie's Story.

"I admit that Ruth is quick-tempered and that she often says things that she does not mean."

It was Hannah Cleaves who spoke, and she was defending her young and pretty cousin, who had been not quite two years the wife of Charles Gray.

"Still," said Susan Adams, another cousin, "I must say that she is much to blame. Her husband is one of the kindest and best of men, and I know that she often makes him unhappy. She might act differently if she would."

"I am not sure of that," returned Hannah. "She is not to blame for the evil disposition which was born in her. She cannot help her own nature. No two of us are alike in all our feelings, and we are all apt to act about as we feel. It is unfortunate that some people are diseased; but I cannot say, that those are to blame who have inherited their disease from their ancestors. And so it is with our disposition."

"But," suggested Susan, "that person who has inherited a disease which works mischief not only to herself, but all around her, is certainly to blame if she does not make any exertion to get rid of it."

"Ay," cried Hannah, "but there are diseases which cannot be got rid of; and I say that Cousin Ruth cannot be blamed for her feelings, because they come in spite of her, and when they have come she cannot hide them."

Aunt Annie Dismore laid her knitting-work aside and gravely shook her head.

"Hannah," she said, with deep solemnity, "you may at some time be a mother; and when that time comes, let me urge you not to teach your children the doctrine you have been upholding here."

Aunt Annie was such a good, kind woman, and she loved us all so well, and did so much for our happiness, that even Hannah Cleaves was respectfully silent beneath the gentle reproof.

"A little while ago," our aunt went on, "you were speaking of willful people. Now, I admire strong self-will when it is bent in the right direction. The noblest of God's children are those who have strong wills. The Christian martyrs were extremely self-willed. Self-will is a beneficial force when it is made to uphold virtue and goodness. And cultivate self-will as much as you please, and make it subservient to right. I fear the trouble with Ruth Gray is, that she has no self-will. What you call self-will in her is only perverseness and inconsistency. She exercises no will at all, but is the creature of circumstance, suffering herself to be swayed to and fro by every gust of passion that sweeps across her path."

When Aunt Annie laid her knitting-work upon the table, and folded her hands in her lap, we knew she had something of interest to say to us, for she was not a woman who talked for the sake of talking.

"I tell you, girls," she said, "we can if we will! If we will do right, we can do right. She who practically denies this casts aside the very foundation of virtuous character, and erects her structure of life upon a basis of sand. I am going to tell you a story of my own life. You call me good; and I think I am good to you. At all events I try to be so. But my goodness of temper came to me through a mighty effort of will, as you shall see. When I was young I was more perverse than your Cousin Ruth ever was. My temper was quick and high; I was subject to fits of despondency that made all around me miserable; and I excused myself upon the plea that such was my nature—I could not help it. When I became the wife of Jacob Dismore I was very happy, and I thought myself very fortunate, for I knew that I had won for a husband one of the best young men in the town. Your Uncle Jacob was then just what he is now—kind, generous, loving, forbearing and faithful to a fault. For the first six months of our married life I did not allow my bad temper to show itself much; but at length my honeymoon waned, and my old feelings began to manifest themselves. I became, in short, just what I was before I was married. People called me self-willed; but I had no self-will. I did not will to be cross and petulant. I was cross and petulant because I had no will to be otherwise. Sometimes I had bad feelings, and I had no will to overcome them. The slightest thing that crossed me found me so entirely devoid of will that it swayed me at its pleasure. At the end of two years there was more of misery than of happiness in my home, and I could not hide from myself the fact that I was the cause of it all; and yet I tried to convince myself that I was not to blame. When my mother talked with me, I declared that I could not help it; and when my husband ventured to allude to the subject, I flew into a passion. I could not bear a chiding from him. In fact, his very kindness and goodness sometimes fretted me; and when he offered to point out to me my errors it seemed as though he were preaching to me, and I would not listen.

"Girls, I tell you truly when I tell that I believe no one was ever more firmly fixed in the habit of ill-feeling than I was at that time, and I did certainly then believe that I could not help it.

"Some time before we were married there had been a volunteer artillery company in our town, and, as Jacob was the only commissioned officer living in the town itself, he took charge of the property which belonged to the corps, thus retaining control of the two handsome cannon. One royal birthday the townspeople raised money for a celebration of the occasion, and, among other things, a royal salute to be fired in the morning, at noon, and at sundown, of which my husband was to have charge.

"During the day I received an invitation to join some friends in a sail upon the river, and, as I could not very well go to the landing alone, I asked Jacob to go with me. He said it would interfere with other duties, and he could not go. I asked him if he thought the firing of the salutes was of more importance than the making of happiness for his wife, and, when he had foiled me at the argument, I asked him why he could not let some one else take charge of the cannon. He answered me calmly and candidly that he dared not trust the gun in other hands. He was the only one who understood how to properly handle it, and he felt obliged to attend to it. He told me how many accidents had happened through the mistakes of inexperienced and careless persons, and he could not feel right to neglect the duty he had promised to perform.

"That was in the afternoon. At 6 o'clock it was time for me to start for the landing place, if I meant to go; but I would not go unless my husband went. He had sent for a carriage to take me down, but I would not use it. I shrank away into a fit of the sulks, and so remained until it came time for Jacob to go away with his gun. As he was putting on his hat my temper burst forth into a wild flame, and his calm answer only maddened me. At length I pushed him beyond the bounds of human endurance, and he turned upon me more sternly than he had ever before done. He did not speak angrily, but he spoke as an offended parent might have spoken to an offending child. This set my blood completely afire, and I cannot tell you all the wicked things I said.

"'Annie,' he said to me, as he stood near the door, 'it might have been better for both of us if we had never met.'

"I answered him hotly and passionately that I hoped we might never meet again. 'If you were dead,' said I, 'I should be happier than I am now!'

"'No, no, Annie, you do not mean that,' he replied to me.

"And I cried out that I did mean it, and I declared that I hoped I might never see him again alive. And he went away as I said those words.

"My dear girls, do you think such words could ever have come from my lips? Ah, you do not know to what wild and wicked results of language a course of unbridled license will lead. If, when Ruth Gray is angrily disputing with her husband, some shorthand writer could take down her words just as they fall from her lips, and should afterward show them to her, she would honestly declare that she never, never spoke such things. And so, when many mothers are fretfully disputing with their children, could they hear themselves as others hear them, they would be shocked beyond measure. When passion becomes our master we are blind as well as insane, and the sin is not in what is then said, but rather in allowing the adversary the first foothold.

"My husband went away and left me alone, and when he had gone I sat down and cried till I was tired. By-and-by I heard the report of the cannon, and I thought, suppose some accident should happen to Jacob! Suppose he should be killed! Suppose they should bring him home dead! As these thoughts came to me, I remembered what a good, kind husband he had been, and I also remembered how cruel and unjust I had been. Again and again came the booming report of cannon, and at each report the dread grew stronger and stronger upon me. Oh, what would I have then given could I have recalled the wicked words I had spoken! But they had gone forth, and I must abide the result. Heavier and heavier grew the weight upon my heart, until at length I thought I should go crazy if Jacob did not soon return. My crime loomed up before me darkly and threateningly, and it seemed to me that my husband's death was to be my punishment. Oh, when would the firing cease, and when would my husband come home, that I might fall upon his neck and ask his pardon for all the wickedness I had done?

"The firing ceased at length, but, instead of hopefulness, the dread became heavier. I was hunting for my bonnet, intending to go out and meet my husband, when I heard heavy feet in the garden. The cloud had settled down and the thunder crash had gone. Men came in and told me not to be frightened—my husband was hurt, but they hoped not seriously. Perhaps they thought I was calm; they did not know that my heart was frozen, and that the fount of emotion was shut up. Then other men brought my husband in on a wide board, and I saw that his limbs were limp and lifeless, that his face was like marble, and that there was blood upon the board—blood trickling down upon the floor! And I heard them talk; they told me that he had been run over by the heavy gun-carriage—that, in coming down the hill from where the salute had been fired, men and boys, in wild confusion, had seized the trail-rope, and that my husband, in attempting to prevent the rush, had been knocked down and run over.

"Two doctors came. I heard them talk of a broken leg, of broken ribs, and of other injuries, and during all this time I was as one in a horrid dream, unable to move or to speak, and almost suffocating. By-and-by I heard one of the doctors say that he would live, and then I sank down senseless.

"When I came to my senses it was night, and one of the neighbors sat at my bedside. I told them I wished to see my husband, but I was informed that he was asleep, and that I must not disturb him then. In the morning I went to him, and he put up his well arm and drew me down upon the pillow and kissed me. And he told me not to worry myself; he was badly hurt, but if I would nurse him and love him he would soon get well.

"Love him! Oh, my soul, how strong I felt then—how strong in my love and in my determination to be a true and faithful wife!"

Aunt Annie took off her spectacles and wiped her eyes, and presently added:

"Girls, that was forty years ago, and from that day to this I have not spoken one cross word to my husband. My nature is not changed at all; but I have gained control of my will, and bent it in the right direction; and when once I found how much pure joy there was in doing right it came very easy to do it.

"Ah! here comes your Uncle Jacob now. See how good he looks! You can see his gray hairs, and note the wrinkles upon his brow; but to me he is as young as ever, and I know that our love was never more fresh than it is now."

Just then Uncle Jacob came in, and when, an hour later, we saw him and Aunt Annie in the garden together picking flowers like two young lovers we were forced to the conclusion that they were really and truly a happy couple; and Hannah Cleaves had no more reason to defend Cousin Ruth against the charge of folly and wickedness in allowing her own ill-temper to make herself and her husband miserable.

Twain's Best Joke.

That quaint and original genius, Samuel L. Clemens—Mark Twain—told a story at his own expense while breakfasting with a journalistic friend in Chicago, which is too good to be lost. There had been some talk at the table about the Grant banquet, when Mr. Clemens remarked with a smile and his peculiar drawl:

"Speaking of banquets reminds me of a rather amusing incident that occurred to me during my stop in smoky, dirty, grand old London. I received an invitation to attend a banquet there, and I went. It was one of those tremendous dinners where there are from 800 to 900 invited guests. I hadn't been used to that sort of thing, and I didn't feel quite at home. When we took our seats at the table I noticed that at each plate was a little plan of the hall, with the position of each guest numbered so that one could see at a glance where a friend was seated by learning his number. Just before we fell to, some one—the Lord Mayor, or whoever was bossing the occasion—arose and began to read a list of those present—No. 1, Lord So-and-so, No. 2, Duke of Something-or-other, and so on. When this individual read the name of some prominent political character or literary celebrity, it would be greeted with more or less applause. The individual who was reading the names did so in so monotonous a manner that I became somewhat tired, and began looking about for something to engage my attention. I found the gentleman next to me, on the right, a well-informed personage, and I entered into conversation with him. I had never seen him before, but he was a good talker and I enjoyed it. Suddenly, just as he was giving me his views upon the future religious aspect of Great Britain, our ears were assailed by a deafening storm of applause. Such a clapping of hands I had never heard before. It sent the blood to my head with a rush, and I got terribly excited. I straightened and commenced clapping my hands with all my might. I moved about excitedly in my chair, and clapped harder and harder. 'Who is it?' I asked the gentleman on my right. 'Whose name did he read?'

"'Samuel L. Clemens,' he answered.

"I stopped applauding. I didn't clap any more. It kind of took the life out of me, and I sat there like a mummy and didn't even get up and bow. It was one of the most distressing fixes I ever got into, and it will be many a day before I forget it."

Terrible Duel.

Memphis papers give the particulars of a savage duel that was recently fought near Lintdale, Mo., on the Mississippi river, a hundred miles above Memphis. It appears that P. H. Nicholas owned a sow which trespassed upon land belonging to A. M. Crockett, which had its leg broken in being driven off Crockett's place. They met in the road and quarreled. Nicholas was in a wagon, coming from Lintdale. Crockett was on horseback. Nicholas threatened to prosecute Crockett for the damage that had been done to his sow. Crockett said: "We'll settle it right here." Nicholas said he would go back to his wagon and fix his coffee so it wouldn't spill, and then fight him. Crockett was armed with a pocket-knife. Nicholas had a dirk. They at once engaged in a deadly combat, in which Nicholas' throat was cut from ear to ear, in such a terrible manner that his tongue dropped out on the ground. He was cut thirteen times, and died at once. Crockett received eighteen cuts, and was butchered almost beyond recognition. He lived but five hours. Both were well-to-do farmers, and each bore the reputation of being peaceable.

MARIE SOLOMON, an old slave, at Baton Rouge, La., was set free by her master when she had reached her 100th year. That was twenty-five years ago. She died in New Orleans not long since.

DISAPPOINTED EXODISTS.

Wretched Condition of the Colored Emigrants Who Sailed for Liberia Last Year.

The bark Monrovia, Capt. Richardson, recently arrived at New York, from Liberia, bringing eighteen colored passengers who went out to that country from Charleston, S. C., in April, 1878, on the bark Azov. As soon as they reached New York they were transferred to the cars and started at once for their homes in South Carolina. Capt. Richardson gave a newspaper correspondent many details of their long story of suffering and unhappiness, of which only a part has been known in this country. The friends of the returning party in this country sent them money with which to pay their passage back to their old homes. They say every member of the Azov party would gladly come back if they could raise funds for the journey. They have found more graves than homes in Liberia, and a more unhappy, miserable lot of people can hardly be imagined. It will be remembered that of the 370 exodists who started on the Azov twenty-nine died on the voyage for lack of proper care and medical attendance. Some thirty or forty have been able to make their way back to this country. Of the 300 and over remaining there are only about sixty persons alive. The climatic fever swept them away by scores. It is seldom fatal if the patient has proper treatment, and is fairly supplied with the essentials of comfort; but those poor wretches were most of them paupers when they landed in Liberia. They had no food, shelter nor medicine, except what was inadequately doled out to them by the Government, or the poor settlers of Monrovia. The result is that they have perished, one by one, until only a remnant of the band remains. The survivors are inured to the climate, and the most of them are at last self-supporting, but not one of them is earning more than the scantiest subsistence. They have had no strength nor money to carry out the plans with which they left America. They expected to go to Bapora, some twenty miles in the interior, on the St. Paul river, where they hoped to open up small coffee farms. They claim that their dependent and helpless condition was the result of the mismanagement and criminality of the agents who had them in charge. They say that the Exodus Association of the South shamefully swindled them, and they lay most of their misfortunes at the door of this concern. Every passenger of the Azov paid, besides his passage, money for provisions for a month's voyage and for six months' provisions after landing in Liberia. They show the receipts for the money paid the association before they embarked at Charleston. When they landed at Monrovia the provisions were distributed, and there was found to be only a scant three weeks' supply. The unfortunate strangers in a far-off land have been too poor and miserable to trumpet their wrongs or to make investigation, and none has been attempted by their friends here, but they claim that there has been foul play somewhere, and their money has been misappropriated. Instead of having the food they had paid for to subsist upon until they had worn off the ill effects of the climate and found some means of support, they were thrown, in the bad season of the year, upon the charity of the residents, who had only a few days' notice of their coming, and who have well-nigh supported them ever since—not without grumbling loudly on account of the irksomeness of the burden. The Azov's party landed at Monrovia in the beginning of the rainy season.

No shelter had been prepared for them, and so the 340 souls were crowded into a lot of dilapidated houses near the beach, which had been abandoned by their tenants on account of leakiness. The emigrants were poorly shielded from exposure, and this greatly aggravated the misery and dangers in which all shared, as the entire party was more or less enervated by climatic fever. The Liberian Government, contrary to its practice, took some measures for their relief, and some money was taken from the treasury to buy them food and medicines.

"Old Si" and the Drummers.

Old Si brought up the church notices and thereupon remarked:

"Ise gwine ter meetin' ter-morrer, sho! I don't know what time er 'skurshun trane's gwine ter flop offen de track an' switch me onter de down-grade, an' I don't want ter go dar, ef hit's jess ter miss de kumpany ob some fokes dat'll be dar!"

"Anybody specially, now?"

"Hit's mos'ly dese hyar kermushul trabellers—dese drummahs—dat Ise boun' ter shake somewhar' twixt heah an' kingdum come, sartin!"

"They are very clever people, aren't they?"

"Well, I ain't 'quainted wid dem all, but, of dem dat I does kno' am fair samples, jess 'skuse me fum de ballunce. W'y, dey's de wust men on de rode—book agints bein' barr'd offen de track!"

"Why do you think so?"

"'Kase Ise had 'sperience wid dem. Dey comes round dar ter de hotel, takes up mo' room dan er dead-head edutur in er sleepin' kyar, cusses de porters wid dere moufs an' han's, hez two trunks erpiece that weighs like dey wuz nailed ter de flo' an' clinched in de room down stairs, an' den dey makes lub to ebery woman in de house fum de chambermades in de garret ter de gubnor's maiden aunt dat bangs de pianner in de front parler."

"They are pretty fast boys, I should judge."

"W'y, yer jest orter porter in er house er while whar dey comes! Dey 'pears ter be hired fer dere moufs, an' two ob 'em kin talk er hotel full er people, in Fair-week times, into gallopin' konsumption! Dey interferes wid de advertizin' bizness ob de newspapers, an' ter heah one ob dem talk yer'd tink he wus de whole 'Soshiated Press, an' had de monoperly ob de news ob de day! But Ise larnt wisdum, an', when I sees er drummah commin' offen de trane, I goes lame right den an' dar!"

"Still they do a great deal of good in commerce."

"Jess so! But den I don't like ter see dese hyar wholesale peddlers manning ober de country in dis style. I'd rudder see Sherman's army comin' agin dan ter see er convention ob drummahs in dis town. Day ar' mongstus cangerus ter de good looks an' de fresh aggs in town, fer dey's pow'ful fond ob toot! An' I say agin I don't want ter go down yander in de 'fernal regions, 'kase, ef I has ter go, I don't want ter be pester'd all de time by dese drummahs tryin' ter sell me pam-leaf fans an' linen dusters!"

FOR THE LADIES.

Et Cetera of Dress and Fashion.

[Compiled from Ehrich's Fashion Quarterly.]

New gray gloves are blue tinted.

New reticules are square and flat.

Hand-painted lace is a late novelty.

Plain velvet cloaks will again be worn.

Colored street wraps are again fashionable.

Undressed kid gloves retain their popularity.

Large and small bonnets are equally fashionable.

Chemisettes and inside kerchiefs are again in vogue.

Many walking costumes are made with a jacket bodice.

Fichus of all sizes and in every imaginable shape are worn.

Tiger and leopard velvets are handsome trimming novelties.

Large rosettes of Breton and point d'esprit laces are worn.

There is no absolute rule about any detail of the toilet this season.

Flowers are as much used for garnitures of evening dress as ever.

Cream-colored silk net, polka dotted and washable, is sold for neck scarfs.

Both very light-colored and very dark costumes for street wear are in vogue.

Striped velvets are not so popular for parts of costumes as those with set figures.

Opera cloaks of white toile sanglier (boar's cloth) bid fair to be very fashionable.

The corsage bouquet of the passing moment is one or several large Turc satin roses.

White felt and plush hats and bonnets continue to be favorite opera and theatre chapeaux.

As many fabrics and accessories now enter into a bonnet as into the most elaborate dresses.

Lambrequin paniers and tabliers must be very ample and carefully draped to look well.

The tendency of the coiffure at the moment is toward classic simplicity and old Greek ideas.

The large directoire bow of Breton or point d'esprit lace is the neatest Parisian fancy in neck wear.

Medium and dark shades of kid gloves will be more worn for full dress than for many seasons past.

Singapore silk is the new name for a soft silk in rich cashmere colors and designs, used for millinery purposes.

Spencers of colored velvets, with lace elbow sleeves, will be worn with white skirts for evening dress by young ladies.

Some foreign fashion journals say that dresses with but one skirt will certainly be worn this winter in heavy materials.

Turc satin is the new name for that soft changeable, twilled, yet lustrous fabric, known sometimes as satin de Lyons.

Lambrequin drapery with paniers and tablier combined is the favorite arrangement for Parisian toilets of ceremony.

Two and three bands of narrow ribbon are wound around the waves of banded hair that are worn with the Greek coil at present.

Corsages opening low in front, in shawl or heart shape, or square a la Pompadour, are fashionable for women of all ages.

White moutonne, a soft lamb's-wool cloth, is used for dressy or evening or reception jackets for young girls, with Oriental trimmings.

A novelty in evening dress fabrics is white toile sanglier, or boar's cloth, a heavy all-wool material, dotted in raised fine points.

Pale dauphin gray and mastic shades of chinchilla and beaver cloth, plain and ribbed, are again used for jackets, dolmans, visites and sacques.

New kid gloves show deep garnet or ruby shades, seal brown, navy blue, blue gray, olive, invisible green, and all the mastic and old gold tones of color.

The crowns of some plush bonnets seem to be composed entirely of jet beads, the embroidery actually covering completely the lace on which the design is wrought.

Two Valuable Inventions.

The following new inventions by residents of Nevada, says the Virginia (Nev.) Chronicle, have been caveated at the Washington Patent Office:

A BARBER'S MUZZLER.—This is a very serviceable contrivance, which can be fastened over a barber's mouth to prevent his talking while shaving customers. It is made of iron, padded inside, and can be fastened securely so as to cover the whole mouth. It is furnished with clamps and screws, which are fixed at the back of the head. Price $2.50. Those furnished with a lever attachment, for the purpose of breaking the barber's jaw come at $3. The plates which fit on the cheek are of the best chilled steel.

THE BONNET GRAPPLE.—This little machine is destined to be of great service to theater-goers. It is an ordinary grappling-hook with a rope attached. The grapple is thrown over any lady's bonnet which may happen to obstruct the view, and the crowd behind can always be depended upon to pull the rope. It sometimes disfigures the lady's face permanently, in which case she never returns to again obstruct the view.

A PHYSICIAN, finding a lady reading "Twelfth Night," said: "When Shakspeare wrote about patience on a monument, did he mean doctor's patients?" "No," she answered, "you don't find them on monuments, but under them."

LINES TO A ROCK.

Old rock, couldst thou but speak, what untold [illegible]
[illegible]
Wouldst thou unfold of ages gone before,
[illegible]
And unnamed cities decked this boundless shore.

For, although thou art a cold, uncouth boulder,
Passed unobserved and in oblivion hid,
Yet [illegible] perhaps, art many centuries older
Than Babel's tower or Cheops' pyramid.

Did antediluvian empires, great in power
As those of modern Greece and Rome, arise?
Did cities, unsurpassed in beauty, tower
In awful grandeur to the sapphire skies?

Did powerful Kings, in regal pomp and splendor,
Lead forth their countless legions to the fight?
Did famished strongholds close-besieged surrender,
And weak dominions yield to those of might?

And when the lightnings rent the heavens asunder,
Rendering more terrible the dreary gloom,
When peal on peal burst forth the awful thunder,
Foretelling sinful man his dreadful doom,

Did none escape the great Creator's anger?
Was there no ship, no ark of refuge built?
Were none more favored warned of coming danger,
To shun the fearful doom of crime and guilt?

Whence came the simple savage, meek and lowly?
King of the soil, he roved the forest free;
Stooping in reverence, pure of thought and holy,
Adored the Manitou on bended knee.

His deafening war-cry o'er the valley sounded,
Echoed his pow-wows through the silent grove;
Swift to the chase, the skillful hunter bounded—
Long were his tales of wild romance and love.

His pride is crushed, his council fires extinguished;
No longer here he finds a place of rest;
His father's birth-right long has been relinquished,
He, humbled, conquered, seeks the distant West.

The pale usurper, Japhet's great descendant
Favored by fate, caressed by fortune, reigns
Monarch unrivaled, free and independent,
Hews down the forests, cultivates the plains.

Ages may pass, great works of art be crumbled,
And Japhet's sons, like chaff, be swept away;
Great empires fall, and mighty Kings be humbled,
And other races rule with iron sway.

Yet thou, oh wondrous wrought, unmoved, unbroken,
Sun-browned and worn by beating winds and rain,
Shall stand alone, mute witness, silent token—
Man's greatest works decay, God's least remain.

DOMO DREAMER.

PITH AND POINT.

No SLOUCH—A high hat.

A "so" as you please—A free drink.

WHAT do the militia go into camphor?

LABEL for dice-box—Shake well before using.

MANY a man who puffs at mounting a flight of stairs will run up an account with the greatest ease.

"THAT'S the first hop of the season," remarked a dancing master as his young hopeful sat down on a tack. Then the music started up and the bawl began.

DISTURBED parent and his 5-year-old: "See here, sonny; what did your mother tell you?" "She told me not to jump." "What makes you jump, then?" "I didn't hear her."

The mule just turned to take a farewell look
At the stable, and the thistles that grew across the brook;
His rider raised a club above the mule's left ear,
And the mule raised up his heels and shed a muleteer.

ONE of the great mysteries of nature is the hole in the heel of a stocking. How it gets there no one knows; the need of it no one sees; the philosophy it no one can explain; the logic is: "Darn it."

AN urchin, who had begged a penny of an old toper in vain, rewarded him with this advice: "Don't you carry that nose of your'n near to no powder fact'ry, or they might play the hose onto yer."

"A WISCONSIN man has expectorated an umbrella-tip he swallowed in 1874," —or so an exchange tells us. This proves conclusively that even swallowing an umbrella won't keep it in the family.

A LADY preacher in Chicago said in the pulpit: "The bread eaten by the people of this country, last year, cost $200,000,000, and the tobacco twice as much." Probably she has the proof to backer.

WHEN John was asked why his engagement with Jane was broken off, he rolled his eyes, looked very much pained, and groaned, "Oh, she turned out a deceiver!" But he did not add the deceiver was himself.

A BOISTEROUS, ill-bred fellow, in a dispute, called his adversary "no gentleman." "I suppose you think yourself one?" was the reply. "Certainly I do," answered the bully. "Then," said the other, "I am not offended that you don't think me one."

"MA, has sister Floy ever traveled any?" "No, child." "Then when I was a lyin' under the sofy Sunday night, and sister and Mr. John came in from church, and was a-sittin' in the big rockin'-cheer, how came her to say that the nicest land she ever was in was Lapland?"

"DER GANDIDATE."

Who stands der streets and corners 'round,
Mid several ages to be ground,
And bowed and smiled, and never frowned?
Der gandidate.
Who holds you when you wants to start,

MISS MILLER, of Ferris, Texas, chloroformed her father's dog and eloped with the young man whom her father had forbidden the premises. The probabilities are that about a year hence she will conclude that her life would have been less miserable if she had chloroformed the young man and eloped with her father's dog.

A TRAMWAY has been opened in the German city of Brunswick on a new principle. The rail has no groove. It is laid exactly flush with the road's level, and may thus be crossed at any angle with any description of conveyance without any jar or disturbance. The car is guided and kept in its place on the rail by slight steel studs on the tire of the wheels, which fit into corresponding holes punched in the rail at the distance of every five inches. The invention is that of an English architect.

DITCHES are dug alongside the Iron Mountain and Southern railroad, three feet wide and two deep, by means of an enormous plow, which is drawn by a locomotive. This machine does the work of 1,000 men.

SABBATH READING.

A Morning Thought of God.

How boundless is Thy Will, Eternal One!
Thou who unfurls the spreading sails of time,
And holds the cordage of this mammoth frame
To guide the rolling powers celestial [illegible]
Swift are Thy [illegible]. [illegible]
Form in Thy wake, with magic power divine
Contending not, but, with a lofty theme,
A glowing reality. Ere rose the
Radiant sun, Thy law in wisdom spake,
And from the depths—exhaustless source sublime—
Up shot the blazing orb to mount the dome—
Eternal lamp for all created things.
Through the rolling orbits Thy image gleams,
Unpolluted not, but with Thine own great will;
Surrounding tiers Thy massive frame with awe,
And ponder in sincerity. Behold
Thy brilliant courts assembled, refulgent
With radiant laws. Behold Thy statutes!
Unnumbered are thy codes; surrounded [illegible]
Thy throne [illegible] monarchs bow and Wait Thy sovereign power. Celestial
Are Thy walls, where knowledge usurps; where all Rejoice to hold commune with Thee. Sweet be Thy repose, if somber hours prevail to Rest Thy lofty mind. Effulgent be the Waking immortal sun's arise, gilding
Thine own great chamber; bathing in richest
Hue Thine own immortal handiwork.
Thy walls with [illegible] recorded—
Joy! a boon that moves the fading powers
Of earth, and guards the charnel-house from fear,
Eternal grant radiating throughout
Thy whole domain! Naught but Thy justice
Shall proclaim the broken links of earth to
Weld in solid chain.
I love the twilight: an awful vision
Opens to my soul, as, standing upon
The ladder of infinitude, I seem
To gaze into the very chamber of Immortality, whereon the harp of Thought contemplation brings in airy flight,
"Till every feeling, every pulse is peace.
Harmonious light shed from the ever
Flaming torch, as it rekindles up the Neighboring scene, grants to my gaze unflagging
Love." Slow from the sky light of day descends,
And morning, radiant with crystal dew,
Reveals tears of love, shed in hours of nature's rest,
Of deeper twilight. Clearer within the
Dawn of glory gleams a world of wonder,
While o'er the harp of thought the passing wind
Awakes in lyric strain the melody
Of nature. Then, turning to the day stars
That ope their browless eyes to twinkle
Upon the floor of nature's wide domain,
What beauteous thoughts arrayed in bud
And blossom that God has made; or, deep in Tangled wild-wood beneath some [illegible] frame,
Whose swaying [illegible], with voluptuous choirs,
Expands, till all the sounding isles proclaim,
As with a thousand tongues, thy common justice
Reigns. Oh! man, search through realms where nature,
Markless, stands, and view the living law that Gushes forth from God, the fountain head! Go
Forth, as with a lamp to find a missing
Pearl, and, as the living hosts perceive thy Prize, thy life in beauty glows.

LYONS, Ohio. J. S. MUDGE.

A Hay-Field Sermon.

The great Teacher's first call, when He began to gather disciples, was a remarkable one. Seeing two fishermen plying their trade, He hailed them and said, "Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men." The call itself was an example of the happy tact in adapting Himself to all kinds of people which always marked His ministry, and which He would have all His followers imitate.

Men like to listen to a clergyman who sympathizes with and understands them, and when he talks to them in the language of their trade, or at least in the simple terms that they know, he is copying after a divine pattern.

The writer has now in mind a successful clergymen who had spent his early years working in a foundry, and who subsequently settled in a town where there were large iron-works.

The rough men in the mills cared little for church or Sabbath, and before his coming had scarcely ever been at a religious service. But they found a friend and a companion in the minister, who talked with them, and who often visited them in the foundries, and they began to go to meeting. "Mr. R—— is a fine man," they said. "He knows all about iron."

An incident in the life of another clergyman illustrates the same valuable faculty of entering into the feelings and interests of others. It shows how a simple act at the right time may do more than a good many words—and the "hay-field sermon" was just that kind of unspoken preaching.

A farmer who never went to church was at work one hot afternoon, with his hired man, raking up his nicely-dried hay, his rack-wagon standing under a tree, ready when it should be time to put on a load.

Suddenly a clap of thunder turned his attention to the sky. A shower was coming up, and he and his man began to hurry with all their might to heap the hay.

The thunder grew louder, and the clouds grew blacker, and, work as fast as they would, the fragrant harvest seemed doomed to be wet. "Fool not to fetch the horse!" muttered the farmer, and he dispatched his man to bring the animal to the field with all haste.

Just then the minister came along, riding home from a round of pastoral visits. He saw the situation at a glance, and, calling the man back, he quickly unhitched the horse from his own wagon, and tackled him to the hay-rack.

Then he pulled off his coat and fell to with good will and muscle, helping pile on the hay. The farmer had no time to remonstrate. The shower was coming up rapidly, and to have waited till his own horse could be harnessed and brought would have made him too late, and he knew it. By the aid so opportunely given, the second and last load was wheeled into the barn just as the rain came down.

The farmer was really grateful, and took out his pocket-book.

"How much shall I pay you for this?"

"Nothing; you are entirely welcome."

The farmer insisted, and finally the minister said to him:

"If you will come next Sunday and hear me preach, I'll call it even."

The farmer agreed, and went; and he found that the minister could preach as well, and even better, than he could load hay. He went again and again, till continual hearing of the gospel made him a believer in it, and a partaker of its blessed faith.

There is no doubt but a little neighborly kindness and tact like this would fill many a vacant seat in our churches.

Madame De Remusat's Reminiscences of Napoleon.

In the recently-published memoirs of Madame De Remusat some curious details are given of the social life of the Tuileries after the Bonapartes had taken possession of the palace. It made a singular impression upon this high-born lady—the swarms of uneducated and rough-riding soldiers, mingled with the few noblemen who, like Talleyrand, adhered to the new regime for the place and power it afforded them, and the crowds of pretty women with whom the First Consul loved to be surrounded.' Something of this incongruity seems to have [illegible] Napoleon himself. He liked fine dresses for his court and his officers, but was best pleased when he himself was dressed shabbily. 'He said one day, of parsimony, to Madame De Remusat, "The right to be simply dressed does not belong to everybody." At another time, while his Marshals were squabbling for precedence, he said: "It is very convenient to govern Frenchmen by vanity." He seemed, then as always, to regard himself as a man apart, not subject to the laws which governed the rest of the human race. After the death of his nephew and presumptive heir, the son of King Louis of Holland, when Talleyrand proposed he should show some signs of mourning, he said, abruptly, "I do not amuse myself by thinking about the dead." In reply to some remonstrance from his wife about his too-open immoralities, he said, with perfect calmness, "I need distractions. I am not a man like other men, for whom laws are made."—Harpers Magazine.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

THE number of foreign firms engaged in commerce in China is 351.

DURING October over 35,000,000 postal cards were sent from the factory—the largest month's business ever done.

THE disproportion of women to men in criminal records is strikingly exemplified in some statistics published by the Italian Government. During the past year the courts sentenced 41,555 persons, of whom 37,999 were men and only 3,556 women, and the police assizes condemned 7,544 men and only 383 women.

THE councils for the settlement of trade disputes in France in their last year considered 35,016 cases. Of this number 25,834 were heard in private, and a reconciliation was effected in 18,415 (71 per cent.); 7,555 could not be reconciled, and were remitted for hearing to the General Council, and 9,076 differences were settled upon advice of the councils. As to the causes of dispute, 21,368 cases were relative to wages, 4,733 to dismissal, and 1,795 to matters affecting apprentices.

IT was generally supposed that the abolition of slavery would greatly reduce the cotton product of the United States. But there never was so grave a mistake. The ten crops of 1852 to 1861 inclusive, being the ten last crops raised by slave labor, numbered 34,995,440 bales. The ten crops of 1870 to 1879 inclusive, being the last ten crops raised by free labor, numbered 41,454,748 bales. Thus, the excess of the ten years of free labor amounts to 6,459,308 bales.

THE King of Northumberland in 690 gave for a history of the world 800 acres of land, and a Countess of Anjou, date not stated, once gave 200 sheep and a large parcel of furs for a volume of homilies, and 120 crowns for a single book of Livy. In 1720, a Latin Bible was valued at $150, and this was a time when two arches of London bridge were built for less than $150. A laborer in those days had wages so small that the earnings of fifteen years had been necessary to buy the Bible, and, the Bible being in Latin, he could not have read it after all.

The First Railroad to Deadwood.

It is now certain beyond question that the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul railroad will be the first to enter the mining town of Deadwood. The following shows what is being done by this company in the way of extending its lines:

"Building operations on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul road are being pushed forward with all the activity which characterizes the management of that corporation. The Iowa and Dakota division is being extended rapidly toward the Black Hills. The track is laid in good shape to a point thirty miles east of Fire Steel, on the Jim river, in Southeastern Dakota, to which point the grading is completed, and ready for the rails. The branch from Marion Junction to Niobrara is completed to within twenty-five miles of that point, and track-laying is proceeding at the rate of two miles per day. The projected branch-line from Rock Valley, nineteen miles east of Canton, to Yankton, a distance of sixty-six miles, is also being pushed forward, and the grading is finished for a part of the distance. It is 250 miles from the Jim river to Deadwood city, and, although the company is not disposed to state what are its intentions in this direction, it is safe to assert that the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Company will be the first to enter Deadwood, and that next year will see the line completed. The grading on the Davenport and Northwestern division, from Fayette to Fort Atkinson, is completed and ready for the iron. The rails are ready and will be laid at once. The short line from St. Paul to Minneapolis is progressing finely. The bridge just above the falls of Minnehaha is 135 feet above the river, and is a triumph of engineering skill. Upon the completion of this short line the St. Paul Company will have a road to Minneapolis, the absence of which has always been a serious drawback.

The Antiquity of Forks.

Among the recent finds in the exploration of the relics of the ancient lake-dwellers of Switzerland is a pair of forks, apparently invented for table use. They were fashioned from the metatarsal bone of a stag. This gives a higher antiquity to table forks (if they were really intended as such) than has hitherto been suspected. Other bone implements and ornaments are frequently found. Animal remains are also common. Among them are the bones of the dog, the badger and the common otter. The latter were doubtless met with in the immediate neighborhood of the lake, but the presence of the bones of the wild ox and of the bear indicate that the lake-dwellers were bold and skillful hunters, as well as ingenious tool-makers. They were also keepers of cattle, for the most numerous animal remains brought to light were those of the common cow and the moor-cow. These exist in every stage of growth, showing that their owners had a taste for both veal and beef, while their fondness for venison is proved by the many bones of the stag and roe discovered by the explorers. Evidence of a like character shows that they were hunters of the wild boar and eaters of the domesticated pig, and the existence of the beaver in Switzerland in prehistoric times is attested by the presence, among other bones, of several which comparative anatomists declare to have belonged to that rodent. One omission on the list is striking. No mention is made of the bones of horses having been found, from which it may be inferred with tolerable certainty that the horse was either altogether unknown to the ancient lake-dwellers, or that they had not succeeded in capturing and taming him.

INDIANA NEWS.

NEW HARMONY has put up street-lamps.

GEN. GRANT'S date for visiting Logansport is Dec. 9.

ROCKPORT shows an ear of corn holding 1,280 kernels.

IT is said that Judge Biddle declines to be a candidate for re-election to the Supreme bench.

COL. HORACE SCOTT has received the contract for building the Vernon, Greensburg and Rushville railroad.

THE new bridge at Fairfield, Franklin county, is nearly completed. The cost of the completed structure will be $12,000.

MRS. LONGSLY, of Laurel, was shot at by her young daughter, while she was reprimanding the young lady for some offense.

JOHNSON township, Crawford county, contains a fine bed of white clay, suitable for potters, and a bed of rock suitable for whetstones.

FARMERS around Indianapolis complain of gypsy and other thieves who plunder their fields and farm-yards, and are talking of organizing rifle clubs.

THE starch factories at Madison have been compelled to shut down on account of the scarcity of corn, and the lack of railroad transportation for the same.

SHIPMENTS of block coal to Cincinnati have been stopped, the favorable weather and the rise in the Ohio river making a supply from Indiana mines needless.

MRS. JOSEPH BATES, of Lafayette, while endeavoring to get her son away from a lot of quarrelsome boys, was struck on the head by a stone, and knocked senseless.

NEARLY 5,000 people assisted in the search for the bodies of the Woodward family, who were drowned at the "Fatal Ford," near Columbus. Those of the mother and daughter were recovered. It is said that eight persons have been drowned at this ford.

THE Grand Temperance Council of Indiana elected the following officers for the ensuing year: President, Dr. Garrish; First Vice President, Dr. Spotiswood; Second Vice President, D. T. Smith; Third Vice President, Dr. Bond; Recording Secretary, C Bradford; Treasurer, Isaac Underwood.

MRS. SCHILLING, who keeps a dairy in Fort Wayne, had a narrow escape from a terrible death. Wishing a drink of cider, she visited the cellar, and, in the dark, by mistake took a vessel containing concentrated lye and drank a quantity of it. Burning with pain, she ran up stairs, but fortunately retained presence of mind, and swallowed the white of an egg.

THE death of Gen. Frank White occurred at Terre Haute a few days ago. He served with distinction in the army during the rebellion, being Lieutenant Colonel of the Seventeenth Indiana volunteers. At the close of 1873 he was commissioned Collector of Internal Revenue for the Seventh District of Indiana, which position he retained until last year. He leaves a wife and two grown children. Deceased was buried at Quincy.

THE formation of Supervisors districts under the census law of March 3, 1879, has been carried out by Superintendent Walker, the following districts being announced for this State. District Supervisors have not yet been appointed, but these officers, when put in office, will have complete charge of the enumeration in their respective districts, and must reside in the territory over which they have charge:

First District—Crawford, Daviess, Dubois, Gibson, Knox, Lawrence, Martin, Orange, Perry, Pike, Posey, Spencer, Vanderburgh and Warrick counties.

Second District—Bartholomew, Brown, Clark, Dearborn, Decatur, Floyd, Franklin, Harrison, Jackson, Jefferson, Jennings, Ohio, Ripley, Scott, Switzerland and Washington counties.

Third District—Delaware, Fayette, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry, Johnson, Madison, Marion, Randolph, Rush, Shelby, Tipton, Union and Wayne counties.

Fourth District—Boone, Clay, Clinton, Fountain, Greene, Hendricks, Monroe, Montgomery, Morgan, Owen, Park, Putnam, Sullivan, Tippecanoe, Vermillion, Vigo and Warren counties.

Fifth District—Benton, Carroll, Cass, Fulton, Howard, Jasper, Lake, Laporte, Marshall, Miami, Newton, Porter, Pulaski, St. Joseph, Starke and White counties.

Sixth District—Adams, Allen, Blackford, De Kalb, Elkhart, Grant, Huntington, Jay, Kosciusko, Lagrange, Noble, Steuben, Wabash, Wells and Whitley counties.

REV. DR. BUDINGTON, who has for a long time been suffering from a cancer of the lip, has recently returned to Brooklyn from Boston, where a third operation for removal was performed without promise of permanent relief from his distressing malady. His friends are not encouraged to believe that he is better, or that there is any hope of improvement, and it is said he has been informed that he cannot hope to be cured of the disease from which he has been so long a painful sufferer.

A BUTCHER in York county, Pa., while cutting rounds from a slaughtered steer, recently, found in the beef a gold dollar, dated 1852. This made the beef cost a dollar less than he had paid the farmer for it, and correspondingly increased his happiness.

A PLEA FOR THE REPUBLIC.

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer.]

The struggle at hand in American politics is a struggle for the preservation of the constitutional republic. Shall the American principle remain? Shall the Democratic idea continue? Shall the simple, farmer republic last? All other questions are less than these in the politics of the next twelvemonth. The Democratic principle has a large majority of the people of this country as its adherents. Local self-government, home rule, exalting the individual, keeping the Government rather than men in subjection—this is the American principle. For this the fight is to be made in the year ahead of us. The peril of a one-man power overhangs the republic. In this great, free nation there is a demand for a "strong man," a man stronger than the constitution. When that demand is indorsed by an emphatic majority of the voters of the United States the end of the republic is at hand. The growing power of corporations, the growth of the power of great cities, the alarming tendency toward the centralization of power in Washington, are dangers to the republic. There must be a union of all its friends to save it from these perils. Men who three or four years ago were shocked at the suggestion that one man should be President of this republic twelve years now surround the silent man as he marches across the continent, and hail his candidacy for a third term as a lovely thing. There is a longing for a Government, not within the constitution, but outside of and beyond it—for a man and a Government "stronger" than the constitution. This longing is an enemy of the republic and a foe of free government on this continent. It is to this danger, or these dangers, that the efforts of the friends of the republic must be unitedly addressed. The existence of the republic as it was is the great end. And we will not believe that the American devotion to the American principle has been extinguished. The same impulses that sent so many thousands of men into the war for the protection of the Union under the constitution will impel men to cling to the constitutional republic in time of peace.

The Democratic party has been the traditional party of discipline. Since the beginning of the century the Democratic devotion has been lofty and admirable. That discipline has apparently relaxed somewhat within a few years. For nearly twenty years the Republican party has held the spoils; and spoils, to a great extent, make discipline. The Democracy no longer have an unorganized or a disorganized foe to contend against; but, on the contrary, a party with all the machinery of Government, with all the patronage; a party audacious, unscrupulous and terribly resolute. The taking of the current Presidency by the Republican party was a wound inflicted upon free government, not so much because one man rather than another was placed in the White House, but because the methods by which a party took power were such as to diminish respect for republican or democratic institutions. The purity of the republic was, at least, brought in question. Her chastity was disputed. The virtue of the republic, which, in its early days, was as holy as wifely fidelity or maidenly honor, is become a topic tossed from scoffing lips to lips more disrespectful, and there are men in high places who, like a resplendent harlot, boast of the shame. All this is demoralizing. The love for the simple republic is diminishing. The respect for the constitutional powers is growing less. The Democratic principle, the American idea, is weakened in the affections of Americans. The holders of political power have, in order to obtain power, so inflamed sectional passion that there is almost a willingness to abandon the republic. The tendency is certainly and painfully in that direction. The duty of the Democracy in this hour is to preserve the republic. The drift is dangerous. Whigs and Republicans in the South have been driven by Republican misrule, by carpet-bag rule, by ignorant, negro misgovernment, into the Democratic party. Republican misconduct in the South has consolidated the South, and now the South is blamed for being solid; and not only the South, but the Democratic party North is blamed most outrageously because Republicans have made the South "solid." Out of all this grows the peril to the republic, to the fundamental ideas of free government in this country. Sectional hatred, even after secession and slavery are forever buried, may crush out the devotion to the republic. The Southern States would divide politically, as they were divided throughout our history till 1860, with the removal of the temporary causes of their solidity. The Southern representation in Congress is made up chiefly of Whigs, not of original Democrats. When the spoil-holders of the Republican party will permit the sentiment of union to rise above the spirit of sectionalism one-third of the Southern States will be debatable ground between the Democratic and Republican parties. The Republican fear seems to be that the Northern States can only be carried for the Republican party by perpetuating sectionalism. They must continue to fight the late war.

The duty of the Democracy from this day till the next Presidency is determined, and thereafter, will be to secure united effort for the maintenance of the republic. There have been divisions in the Democratic ranks; they must end. Personal ambitions must sink. The East and West must join. There must be concessions, harmony. The treatment of the black men in the South must be fair and equal. The representatives of the South, by silence or by temperate expression, must earn the confidence of the independent Northern vote. They must make special effort to do this, because they know that a Republican microscope is fixed upon everything they say and do. The tendency of the Republican party is become anti-republican, perilously so. The unjust cry is, "Better a monarchy than a solid South;" and the silent soldier walks stately from the Pacific to the Atlantic while the name of a third term is sweet in the mouths of men and a third nomination for the Presidency only waits his acceptance. The Democratic duty is prudent, united effort. The Democratic Congress must be moderate, and must not demand what the world now knows it can not get. The extra session fixed the boundary lines. The Republican President can not refuse to grant again what he has granted once; the Congress should not demand again what it has been once, or more than once, refused. The prime mission is the salvation of the republic from the tendencies that mean its destruction. The future of the Democracy thus lies in the path of the maintenance of free government, of Democracy. Let not sectionalism or centralism rise above republicanism.

Senator Chandler's Petit Larceny.

Among the stories going the rounds about Senator Chandler is one illustrating his bluff manners. He was much chagrined at the President's neglect of him after the inauguration, and had hoped for a place in the Cabinet. In his disappointment he refused for many months to go to the White House. Finally he went. Shortly after his return here from a trip home as a private citizen he met the President, who grasped his hands warmly, and, with an air of patronage, said: "Well, Chandler, I suppose your old constituents were glad to welcome you home again." "Yes, Mr. President," Chandler replied, "I met with but one man who seemed discontented. He is an old Republican, and, taking my hand on seeing me, he said: 'Chandler, I believe you are an honest man; you never did steal anything but the Presidency, and that, as it turns out, is only petty larceny.'" Confidential relations were not resumed on that day.—Washington Cor. New York World.

GOING UP.

The Rapid Advance of Prices.

[From the Manufacturer and Builder, New York.]

The greatest rise in prices has been in articles of hardware, and, so far as these enter into the construction of a house, the builder finds that his estimates must be very materially increased. Nails are 70 per cent. higher to-day than they were at the beginning of the present year. Window-weights have advanced fully 75 per cent.; locks and knobs have risen nearly 45 per cent. upon the average; tacks and kindred goods, 25 per cent.; common door butts and hinges, fully 100 per cent.; and such other odds and ends of hardware as are used in building, an average of no less than 40 per cent.

Common window-glass, either German, French or American, cannot be bought to-day within 20 per cent. as cheap as it could on the 1st of January. A box of glass suitable for sashes 15x30 inches in dimensions costs $3.90 to-day, against $2.98 at the beginning of the year; a box for 10x15 sashes costs $2.70 to-day, against $2.10 on the 1st of January; and a box of glass for 13½x26 sashes costs $3 now, against $2.50 when the year opened. Sashes, doors and blinds have recently undergone a very material advance. Blinds have been unprofitably low, and the present prices constitute a rise of from 35 to 45 per cent. A blind upon which the combination price was lately 50 cents now costs 65 cents; those which formerly sold for 70 cents now sell for 90 cents; and those which formerly sold for 78 cents now sell for $1.10. Sashes with glass ready set are over 30 per cent. dearer to-day than at the beginning of the year.

Doors are constantly advancing, and it is difficult to keep the run of the new prices which are made by the manufacturers.

In brick there has been, since the 1st of January, an advance on some grades of common of over 30 per cent.; but in lime, sand, and cement there has been very little variation, and the same may be said of paints and oils. In all these articles, however, there is a hardening tendency, and it may be generally said of them that, though there has been very little nominal advance, yet figures which could often be obtained upon them six or eight months ago are not possible to-day. In "dull times" it frequently happens that dealers are willing to give quiet concessions to customers for the purpose of securing trade when there has apparently been no actual decline in prices; and, upon the other hand, when business begins to improve, the firmer feeling which prevails renders such concessions difficult to obtain, even though prices are not quotably higher. The estimates which builders were able to furnish last winter and spring, therefore, were lower than to-day, not only because of the advance which has actually since occurred in some materials, but because of the concessions which were then possible in others.

Ordinary building lumber and shingles, clapboards, etc., are not quotably higher to-day than at the beginning of the year, but the Eastern mills are generally running full and are approaching a position where they can take their pick of orders. In the West a material advance has occurred on finishing stock, and the retail dealers are talking of a corresponding advance here.

Hard-wood lumber for finishing purposes is also firmer, and ash and cherry will cost some 6 per cent. more than on the 1st of January. Black walnut sells to-day at about the same price as at the beginning of the year, but it has recently advanced to that figure after a decline of from 3 to 5 per cent.

The cost of plumbing a house to-day is from 20 to 25 per cent. greater than on the 1st of January.

Boys' Doings.

Willie Cook, aged 11, and Frankie Thompson, aged 7, attended the same public school in Chicago. One day, not long ago, Willie made a snow-ball, held it in water until it formed a globe of ice, and then fired it at Frankie, hitting him a terrific blow in the stomach. He lingered in frightful agony for several days, and death came at last as a welcome relief. At the time of his death the little fellow was bloated most unnaturally, and his face was disfigured with eruptions and scratches, as if he had had the small-pox.—Ten young boys, of London, Canada, have been discovered in a plot to buy a schooner and turn pirates on the lakes. They had purchased revolvers, and were concerting as to weapons of warfare. The money for the outfit ($180) one of the boys stole from a relative. The oldest boy is 12 years of age. The boys said they got their idea of the plot from reading "Jack Harkaway" and kindred stories.—A 4-year-old son of F. B. Seelye, of Adams, Mass., while running about the house with a tin whistle in his mouth, accidentally fell, driving the whistle through to the back part of the neck, striking the spinal column, and making a possibly fatal wound.

The Empress Eugenie.

Eugenie de Montijo, Countess of Teba, was a beautiful woman of 27, who had had a youth of vicissitudes, and was well known in many capitals for her beauty, grace and rank, which, having no fortune to support them, gained her and her mother only the undeserved title of adventuresses. The malice of party has raged fiercely against this lady's name, but there is not a particle of proof to sustain it. Her ability, her affectionate devotion to the interests of her family, and her religious fervor are, so far as the world knows, as unquestionable as her beauty and her personal charm. No Queen in history has better fulfilled a Queen's duty as leader of the fashions; while she reigned, the dress of women was at once beautiful, decent, and convenient. Hers was the prettiest face, the most graceful bearing, the most winning smile, in all that dazzling court of the Tuileries. But she had a Spaniard's love of political intrigue, and an Andalusian's bigotry, and she contributed powerfully to engage her husband in the evil way that led his policy to Rome and his army to Sedan. There is a story told by Arsene Houssaye—certainly no unfriendly chronicler—that at the Cabinet Council called to decide the question of peace and war, after the final interview of Benedetti with King William at Ems, the peace party carried the day, and the Emperor went to bed. But the Empress, being left behind with the council, won over to her warlike views the gallant De Grammont and the absurd Lebœuf, and reversed the decision, and then went in triumph to the Emperor's chamber, where he was sleeping the sleep of the just, and gained his assent to the fatal declaration which was made next day by the jaunty De Grammont, with his hands in his pockets, and by Oliver, with his cœur leger.—Harper's Magazine.

When teas a few years ago sold at $1,50 and $2.00 per pound the extreme high prices almost kept the use of tea as a luxury; this is not so any longer. Teas are now relatively cheaper than coffee and the demand for them so increased the last five years that we now sell 2 and 3 chests daily. We keep up our usual motto of no middlemen. Our teas go direct to our customers and we purchase direct from importers, thereby saving them the three profits of the speculators, jobbers and wholesale merchant, which is at least 16 to 20c per lb.

Great Warriors Never Work.

Pish, one of the chiefs supposed to be engaged in the present outbreak, had been to Washington. One cold day governor McCook came into his office and found Pish hugging a stove. Thinking it a good chance to deliver a lesson to the Indian, he said: "Pish why don't you Indians plow and raise crops and build houses? You ought to work. If you did, you would not have to come here to borrow my fire, but could buy fire of your own. Why don't you work like white men?" Pish straightened up at once and proceeded to make a speech. "Me great warrior," said he. "Warriors no plow. Me go to Washington and see John Grant. (The Indians all call him John.) John Grant great warrior. He no work. He no plow. Me see John Grant's squaw. She no work, either, too. Great warrior never work. Tell you what do. You say to John Grant he come here and go with me. We go out and fight 'Rapahoes and Cheyennes and kill plenty braves, and get plenty squaws. Then squaws work, and me and John Grant have bully good time. No work, no plow, no nothing."

Whether the proposition was ever forwarded to Grant we do not know.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Scribner's Illustrated Magazine for Girls and Boys.

John Greenleaf Whittier writes of St. Nicholas: "It is little to say of this magazine that it is the best child's periodical in the world." That it is calculated to delight the little folk everywhere is indicated by the fact that it is to be issued in French by Delagave for Paris, and that even the far-away little Moslems are now to have a volume made up of translations form St. Nicholas into Arabic.

Beginning with the November number, this monthly magazine for children is printed on heavier paper with wider margins, and is so much enlarged that each number contains eighty or more pages, with stories, poems, illustrated aricles of travel and description, pictures, rhymes, jingles, etc.; pages of large type for the very little ones, and a riddle box for the amusement of the whole family. For the coming year the publishers announce many brilliant novelties, including a new serial by Miss Louisa M. Alcott, entitled "Jack and Jill." It is written in this favorite author's best vein, and will begin in the Christmas (December) issue. There will be a series of Open-Air papers, by various authors, devoted to description of out-door life and incidents in many lands; and a new department, "The Treasure-Box of English Literature," in which will be given gems from standard authors.

A new serial story for boys, "Among the Lakes," by the author of "Dab Kinzer," began in the November number.

Another splendid serial for boys has been secured for this volume,—"The Fairport Nine," a story of a base-ball club, by Noah Brooks.

The wonderful Christmas number (ready Dec. 1st) is the largest and most beautiful issue of any magazine for girls and boys ever published, containing over one hundred pages and ninety-five pictures.

Among other attractions, it will contain twelve short stories by J. T. Trowbridge, Washington Gladden, J. W. De Forest, Maurice Thompson, Sarah Winter Kellogg, and others.

John Greenleaf Whittier contributes a long poem, while Lucy Larcom and Mary Mapes Dodge are also represented in verse.

There is a Christmas play for festivals by Edward Eggleston; an illustrated art-paper on Thorvaldsen, and an account, with twelve pictures, of the life and doings of New York telegraph boys.

Gustave Dore, Knaus, Mary Hallock, Foote, Kelly, Dielman, Bensell, Sheppard, Eytinge, Jessie Curtis and Addie Ledyard are among the artists whose labor has helped to make beautiful this number of "The World's Child-Magazine."

Buy it and see what St. Nicholas really is. For sale by all book and news dealers, or it will be sent post-paid by the publishers on receipt of price; 25 cents a number; $3.00 a year.

SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY.

So great has been the demand for recent numbers of this magazine that the monthly circulation has increased more than 20,000 copies within the year, and the edition for November, 100,000, was exhausted within two weeks after issue. The English edition has recently doubled, and the magazine has everywhere taken its place as the most handsomely illustrated popular periodical published in the English language. Every number contains 160 pages of contributions from the best American authors, and from 50 to 100 wood engravings. The publishers call attention to the following

ANNOUNCEMENTS FOR 1880. THE REIGN OF PETER THE GREAT, by Eugene Schuyler, will begin in an early number, and continue through two years. It will be a work of great historical significance and of rare graphic and dramatic interest. Bureaus of illustration have been established in Paris and St. Petersburg, specially for the execution of the pictorial part of this enterprise—an enterprise involving a greater outlay than any previously undertaken by a popular magazine.

THREE SERIALS IN SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY BY AMERICAN WRITERS.—The Grandissimes, a story of New Orleans Creole life, by George W. Cable, author of "Old Creole Days." "Louisiana," a new novelette of American Life, by Frances H. Burnett, author of "That Lass o' Lowrie's." Confidence, by Henry James, Jr., begun in the Midsummer Holiday (August) number.

CANADA PICTURESQUE.—A number of papers by Principal Grant, of McGill University, Kingston, and W. G. Beers and Chas. Farnham, are in course of preparation for Scribner's, which will give thorough accounts of the historical, political, picturesque, and other phases of the country.

PAPERS ON ART.—The growth of art has made it necessary for the modern magazine to devote considerable attention to this subject, and in this respect Scribner's Monthly will continue to occupy the leading place, both in the judicious selection and in the artistic execution of the subject chosen.

POETS AND POETRY.—Edmund Clarence Stedman will contribute to Scribner's Monthly during the coming year critical essays on this subject, including the beginnings of the poetic in this country, and its subsequent history. Richard Henry Stoddard will furnish studies of subjects connected with English poetry, the first paper being on "The English Sonnet."

SAUNTERINGS WITH DICKENS.—A number of unique papers to be contributed to Scribner by Alfred Rimmer, Esq., of Chester, England. For the illustration of these, Mr. Charles A. Vanderhoof has been sent on a special trip to England.

PRACTICAL PAPERS ON HOME SUBJECTS.—This class will include a number of finely illustrated papers on "Small Fruits and their Culture," by Rev. E. P. Roe, of Cornwall, N. Y., one of the most successfull of horticulturists. Papers on "Church and Home Architecture" will be contributed by Russell Sturgis, Esq.

SPORTS AND RECREATIONS.—In addition to an illustrated account of the recent excursion of the Tile Club in a canal-boat, there will be a number of special papers during the year, upon odd personal experience, such as Porpoise-Shooting, Walrus; Hunting, Lobster-Fishing, Canoeing in the Rapids of the Hudson, and several papers of a novel character

OTHER FEATURES OF SCRIBNER.—"Extracts from the Journals of Henry J. Raymond," edited by his son, H. W. Raymond; Accounts of the South Pass Jetties, American Arms and Ammunition in Europe. The U. S. Coast Life-Saving Service, The New Albany Capitol, Child-Saving Work, etc., etc. Sketches of Louisiana Life and Scenery, New-York City and Vicinity, American Life in Florence, Kansas Farming, California Mountain Sheep and Forests (by John Muir), House-hunting in Paris, Sheep Ranching in the West, and many other interesting subjects. And there will be the usual variety of essays, poems, and short stories.

Price, 35 cents a number, $4.00 a year. For sale and subscriptions received by all Booksellers, Newsdealers, and Postmasters, or sent post-paid by the publishers on receipt of price.

Special Announcement.

We take pleasure in announcing that we have made arrangements with the publishers of the STATE SENTINEL which enable us to make the following very liberal offer:

To all persons who pay their subscription account to date, we will send the COURIER and WEEKLY SENTINEL one year for $2.50 in advance. In addition to this we will make each subscriber a present of "THE LAW OF THE FARM," by Jas. B. McCreills, of the Indiana bar. This valuable phamphlet ought to be in the hands of every farmer in the state. The work embraces the following subjects:

1st. How to buy a farm.
2nd. How far the farm extends, or its proper boundaries.
3rd What the deed of a farm includes.
4th The farmer's rights in the road.
5th As to farm fences.
6th As to estray and trespassing animals.
7th The farmer's liabilities for his animals.
8th Of dogs—the farmer's liability for and protection against.
9th Of water rights and drainage.
10th Of trespassing on the farm.
11th The rights of adjoining proprietors to fruit and other trees on and near boundary lines.

The INDIANA WEEKLY STATE SENTINEL is an eight-page paper, (the same as the COURIER) and will contain a supplement of two additional pages about half of the time. It is the recognized organ of the democracy of Indiana, and will always be found full of news of a general character. Its editorials present strong argument in favor of economy and against class legislation, and its agricultural department is adapted to the wants of every farmer.

Remember that the $2.50 must be paid in advance, and the COURIER subscription account must be paid to date, in order to secure this liberal offer. tf.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y. 42-eow-6m.

The Constitutional Amendments.

Seven important amendments to the constitution of Indiana have been agreed to by a majority of the members elected to each of the two Houses of the General Assemblies of 1877 and 1879, and by an act of the last general assembly, approved March 10, 1879, these said amendments are to be submitted to the electors of the state of Indiana for ratification or rejection at an election to be held on the first Monday in April, 1880. The law providing for the submission of these amendments to the electors of the state enacts that "the secretary of state shall procure ballots of blue paper, on each of which shall be printed the proposed amendments, and below each amendment shall be printed the word 'Yes' in one line, and in another line the word 'No;' that any qualified elector may vote for or against any amendment by depositing one of said ballots in the ballot-box. If he intends to vote for any amendment, he shall leave thereunder the word 'Yes,' and erase the word 'No' by drawing a line across it, or otherwise. If he intends to vote against any amendment, the word 'Yes' shall in like manner be stricken out and the word 'No' left; and if both words are allowed to remain, without either of them being erased, the vote shall not be counted either way." These amendments are designated by numbers, and are numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 9, numbers 7 and 8 having failed to receive a majority of votes of both branches of the last General Assembly.

AMENDMENT NO. 1.

Amend section 2 of article 2 so as to read as follows:

Section 2. In all elections not otherwise provided for by this constitution, every male citizen of the United States of the age of 21 years and upwards, who shall have resided in the state during the six months, and in the township 60 days, and in the ward or precinct 30 days immediately preceding such election, and every male of foreign birth, of the age of 21 years and upward, who shall have resided in the United States one year, and shall have resided in the state during the six months, and in the township 60 days immediately preceding said election, and shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, shall be entitled to vote in the township or precinct where he may reside, if he shall have been duly registered according to law.

AMENDMENT NO. 2

simply provides for striking out the words—"No negro or mulatto shall have the right of suffrage," contained in section 5 of the second article of the constitution.

AMENDMENT NO. 3.

Amend section 14 of the second article to read:

Section 14. All general elections shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, but township elections may be held at such time as may be provided by law. Provided, that the General Assembly may provide by law for the election of all judges of courts of general and appellate jurisdiction by an election to be held for such officers only, at which time no other officers shall be voted for; and shall also provide for the registration of all persons entitled to vote.

AMENDMENT NO. 4

amends by striking the word "white" from sections 4 and 5 of article 4, conforming the same to the constitution of the United States.

AMENDMENT NO. 5

amends the tourteenth clause of section 22 of article 4 to read as follows:

In relation to fees or salaries, except the laws may be so made as to grade the compensation of officers in proportion to the population and the necessary services required.

AMENDMENT NO. 6.

The following amendment is proposed to wit: Amend section 1 of the seventh article to read:

Section 1. The judicial power of the state shall be vested in a supreme court, circuit courts, and such other courts as the General Assembly may establish.

The words "such other courts" are substituted for the words, "such inferior courts."

AMENDMENT NO. 9.

No political or municipal corporation in this state shall ever become indebted, in any manner, or for any purpose, to an amount in the aggregate exceeding 2 per centum on the value of the taxable property within said corporation, to be ascertained by the last assessment for state and county taxes, previous to the incurring of the indebtedness, and all bonds or obligations in excess of such amount given by such corporations shall be void; provided that in time of war, foreign invasion, or other great public calamity, on petition of the majority of the property owners, in numbers and value, within the limits of such corporation, the public authorities, in their discretion, may incur obligations necessary for public protection and defense, to such amount as may be requested in such petition.

SOME REASONS

Why Gov. Hendricks should be the Next President.

We give below a letter written by a prominent Fort Wayne democrat, published recently in the Sentinel of that city, and containing some solid reasoning with reference to Gov. Hendricks' claims and chances for the presidency. Peruse and ponder:

In your published interview with Fort Wayne democrats, following the New York election, it was stated that I pronounced in favor of Mr. Bayard for the democratic candidate for president. As I have been spoken to by a number of democrats upon the subject, I have thought best to make a correction. I do not know that my preferences will have much weight either way, but I have a desire to occupy a correct position, and to be understood in that position. Your reporter must have misunderstood what I said. I have been from the first, and am now most earnestly in favor of Gov. Hendricks for that nomination.

In the first place, I think he is entitled to it. The Indiana delegation, as well as all Indiana democrats who were at the St. Louis convention were unanimous and earnest in their support of Gov. Hendricks for the nomination in 1876.

The delegates from all the states eulogized him very highly as a man, a democrat, and a statesman. The almost universal reply to our solicitations was, "Gov. Hendricks will be the man four years hence."

The convention thought best to nominate Mr. Tilden at that time, and then insisted that for the sake of success in Indiana, Gov. Hendricks should take the second place on the ticket. For that success he and his friends consented, and Indiana was carried.

I think that Indiana is now entitled to the candidate.

In the second place, I think Gov. Hendricks is the strongest man we have at this time. There is no split or dissention among the democrats of Indiana. Gov. Hendricks was the first to lead the state out from under republican rule. He was elected governor while the balance of the ticket was lost. He was the first democratic governor elected in the northern states after the war.

The example of Indiana doubtless had much influence upon the sister states that afterwards elected democratic governors. And then too, without saying a single thing in disparagement of the distinguished gentlemen of the east, who are spoken of in connection with the nomination, I am in favor of a western man. There is no reason why New York may not be carried with Gov. Hendricks and a candidate for vice president from that state. Indeed, it seems to me that New York would be more certain with such a ticket than otherwise. Gov. Hendricks is not only popular and strong in Indiana, but in the other states. This popularity arises from the fact that though emphatic and strong in the doctrines of the democratic party, he has never been radical. In the midst of the exciting and exasperating contests through which the democracy have passed, he has occupied a conservative, wise and safe position upon all questions. His varied experience, wise statesmanship, and purity of character commend him to the democracy and ought to recommend him to the whole people. These are some of the reasons why I favor his nomination. In my judgment the democracy of Indiana ought to be a unit in an earnest effort to bring about that nomination. Respectfully.

ALLEN ZOLLARS.

Colorado Railroads and Railroad Traveling.

BY L. G. CALKINS.

* * * * * * * After a very grave council, it was agreed to take the Chicago and Northwestern and Union Pacific Railroads to Denver, at present the booming city of the country, if not of the world.

At 10:30 a. m. we were most comfortably seated in one of the celebrated, and I may say world-renowned, hotel cars of the Chicago and Northwestern railroad, and, of course, our first topic of conversation, as it seemed to be with everyone after being seated for the first time in really a palace hotel on wheels, was to discuss the situation.

We had heard of these magnificent hotel cars, run only on this road, but must frankly confess had never fully understood the maximum amount of comfort and luxury in railroad traveling until this trip from Chicago to Council Bluffs. The interior construction of the car is simply exquisite, and for neatness in appearance and order in all its arrangements there is perhaps nothing on this continent its equal.

It being nearly noon when we embarked, we did not have to wait long to have our curiosity gratified as to the arrangements of the culinary department of this institution. An Englishman sitting just opposite us, after enjoying a sumptuous repast in the most leisurely manner, exclaimed "this way of traveling is simply perfect." We ate as long and as slow as we pleased of food evidently prepared with more than ordinary skill.

Meals are served on the European plan—pay for what you have—so that a traveler does not have to pay seventy five cents for a cup of tea and a little toast.

But one of the marked features and crowning characteristics of this road is its safety.

The rapidity with which a train of cars moves very naturally suggests the idea of danger to one not accustomed to such rapid traveling.

I have heard the statement that the Chicago and Northwestern railroad was the safest in the country. Whether that be true or not, Mr. Editor, I observed two or three facts which I deem it proper to refer to in this connection, for safety in railroad traveling is a consideration of no small moment.

First, the road-bed seems to be a perfect one, with steel rails the entire distance from Chicago to Council Bluffs, hence its firm and substantial character is very readily realized as the train passes over it.

Another feature I noticed was the most perfect condition of the cars run on this road. The coaches all had the appearance of just coming from the shop, and seemingly in the most complete order for service and safety.

Another feature of safety was the kind of men employed to run the trains. They were evidently not of ordinary stock, but were selected as men worthy to be trusted with the lives of hundreds and thousands of people. There was an air of business and stability about them that gives a traveler a feeling of trust and confidence.

Mr. Editor, I have been thus specific on the question of the safety of this road, for this is one of the first things that a traveling public desire to be assured of, and I am satisfied that the company controlling this great and important line spares no pains or expense to make this feature of their road all the public can ask or demand, and this is why this road is so entirely free from reports of accidents.

In going westward we passed through some of the most interesting portions of Iowa in the night, but in returning had a fair opportunity to see some of the finest country in the world in that state along the line of this road.

At home and abroad, Iowa stands as one of the finest farming states in the Union, and the broad acres of growing crops are certainly a rich feast for the eyes. The fields of corn were simply immense, and the herds of fine cattle indicate great thrift and prosperity. And the general appearance of houses, barns, yards, shrubbery, etc., showed that men of enterprise and intelligence had sought and were beautifying homes in this land of plenty.

After a most agreeable ride of less than twenty-four hours, we arrived at the Union Pacific Railroad depot, one of the liveliest and most interesting places in all Christendom, about 9:30 a. m.—The Investigator, August, 1879.

Several valuable facts become conspicous by these figures:

1. The highest vote cast for any candidate is that of Seymour, the only democrat who is elected, and whose vote is higher than that of Wadsworth, the most popular man on the republican ticket, and over 21,000 votes higher than that of Cornell.

2. The highest majority received by any candidate is that of Mr. Seymour—over 14,000.

3. The combined vote of Kelly and Robinson was 34,635 more than the vote for Cornell, and 14,082 more than the highest republican vote cast for Wadsworth.

4. The total vote was 117,940 less than the vote in 1876.

5. The great majority of the votes that stayed at home were democratic—disgusted at the division in the party, but who will certainly go to the polls next year.

Mr. Jay Gould's Personal Habits.

[illegible]

Mr. Gould's millions now come close to those of Vanderbilt. He is a man of finer texture than the old Commodore's son. He doesent run to fine houses, costly stables, and blooded steeds. At night, when he dismisses his operators from the telegraph offices in his own house in Fifth avenue, and enters up in a little book the telegraphic reports of the receipts of the various railroads which he owes, he does not go to a club to carouse, to a banquet to steam up with champagne, or to a theatre; he retires to the recesses of a peaceful library, and, with his young sons about him, reads the Latin classics, the world forgetting, but not the world forgot—by a large majority. The next morning early he has the telegraph doing lightning service, and he is sending an electric shock through Wall street as soon as the bulls and the bears come into that field for pasture. Mr. Gould is a liberal man, although when he makes a bequest he does not have the information written in manifold and sent to all the newspapers. The first news New York had of his gift to the Memphis sufferers of $5,000 came from Memphis, as did the news of the second gift of $5,000.

Mr. Gould, being a small man of little physical prowess, is naturally not disposed to put himself recklessly in the way of the horns of the bulls and the claws of the bears. There are some men in Wall street, as Mr. Gould has reason to know, who wish to resent their losses with their fists, and are disposed to follow Major Selover's example and despatch him bodily down into a convenient area. Accordingly, Mr. Gould keeps his office guarded by a stout Irishman, who prevents the intrusion of visitors, and he has usually a private way to get out into the street. He has, too, it is said, a big Italian bookkeeper who accompanies him on many of his business trips about town, and stands ready to protect his millionaire employer.

How to Keep Eggs Fresh

[Indiana Farmer.]

A correspondent writes thus in a contemporary: It is sometimes desirable to store away eggs in the summer, when prices are so low that we cannot afford to sell them, until they are scarce and will be keenly relished, or can be disposed of at a good price. To keep them thus we do not believe there is a more simple and efficient way than the one we have successfully practiced for the last thirty or forty years. This is by simply taking none but perfectly fresh and sound eggs, and setting them, in layers on the tip or small end, in a box or basket or anything that will hold eggs. We do not put anything between them, nor do we put them up 'air tight,' but we alway keep them in the cellar. Eggs that we have put away in this position last fall are to-day—after six months—as good and fresh as the day they were laid, and we have never found one that was spoiled for stale among them, when thus served. We feel confident that they would keep good and fresh for one year.

The Finest and Most Natural.

The finest, purest, and best flavors for cakes, puddings, pastry, &c., are Dr. Price's Special Flavoring Extracts. In this age of adulteration, it is gratifying to find one to stick by the old path of honesty, and consumers owe it to themselves to patronize such efforts.

In Hayes' first message to the 46th congress, presented last Monday, he presents his civil service hobby at length in reference to assessing government employes for campaign purposes, he says:

"In whatever aspect considered, the practice of making levies, for party purposes, upon the salaries of officers is highly demoralizing to the public service and discreditable to the country. Though an officer should be as free as any other citizen to give his own money in aid of his opinions or his party, he should also be as free as any other citizen to refuse to make such gifts. If salaries are but a fair compensation for the time and labor of the officer, it is gross injustice to levy a tax upon them. If they are made excessive in order that they may bear the tax, the excess is an indirect robbery of the public funds."

A frank and unqualified acknowledgement that the republican party has been guilty of robbing the government of millions of dollars in the last eighteen years.

The CHEAPEST and BEST in the World.

Too Long in Use to Doubt its Superior MERITS

No Money to Pay until Machine is Delivered to you and Examined.

It makes the shuttle, double-thread, lock-stitch, (the same on both sides of the work), which received the highest reward at the Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia, Pa., 1876. And is complete with a larger assortment of attachments for fine work than any other machine, and reduced to only $25.

It is an easy and pleasant machine to operate, requires the least care, produces every variety of work, and will last until the next century begins. Strong, simple, rapid and efficient.

Use it once and you will use no other. The money cheerfully refunded if it will not outwork and outlast any machine at double the price.

Agents sell them faster than any other in consequence of their being the "best at the lowest price."

Each machine throughly warranted with written guarantee for five years. Kept in order free of charge; money refunded at once if not satisfactory.

It is the most solid, reliable, and satisfactory machine ever invented for all kinds of family work. It is an acknowleged unequivocal mechanical success, thoroughly tested and used in thousands of homes. An efficient, silent, rapid, reliable and ever-ready helper to the weary wife or seamstress, it will do the work of a family for a lifetime, or it will earn from $4 to $5 per day for any one who wishes to sew for a living. This machine costs less than half the price of any new machine of like quality. Has extra long, large-sized shuttle, easily removed. Extra large-sized bobbins, holding 100 yards of thread, doing away with the frequent rewinding of bobbins. It is built for strength and constant hard work. Interchangeable working parts, manufactured of fine polished steel. Will run for years without repairs; is simple to learn, easy to manage, understood perfectly in an hour, and always ready in a moment to do every description of heavy or fine work, at less cost or trouble than any other machine at any price ever did or can do. It will sew anything a needle can pierce, from lace or cambric to heavy cloth or harness, with any kind of thread, and will run off twenty yards per minute; it uses strong, straight needles, and never breaks them. It cannot miss or drop a stitch, ravel or break the thread. If you have any other machine, buy this and have a better one. The ease and rapidity of its motion and quality of its work, are its best recommendations. It will hem, fell, tuck, braid, cord, bind, gather, quilt, ruffle, pleat, fold, scallop, shirr, roll, baste, embroider, run up braids, etc., with elegance, ease and quickness, unsurpassed by any machine ever invented.

BEWARE OF IMPOSITION.

The price for our new machines are less than those asked by dealers in second-hand, rebuilt and refinished machines, or those selling out old stock to close up business, many such inferior and old style machines being offered as new at reduced prices; beware of imposition and only buy new machines. There are no new first-class machines offered as low as the "FAMILY," by many dollars.

CONGRESSIONAL SUMMARY.

The first regular session of the Forty-sixth Congress convened at noon, on Monday, Dec. 1, and a committee was appointed to inform the President and House of Representatives that the Senate was ready for business. President Hayes' message was read, after which the Senate adjourned. The following nominations were sent in for confirmation by the President: George W. McCrary for United States Judge in the Eighth Circuit; Joseph B. Leake for United States District Attorney in the Northern District of Illinois; Charles G. W. French for Chief Justice of Arizona Territory; Norman Buck for Associate Justice in Idaho Territory....On the opening of the House, 232 members answered to their names, showing fifty-six absentees. The new members from Iowa, New York and California took the oath, after which the usual committee to inform the President and the Senate was appointed. After a short recess, the President's message was received and read, when the House adjourned.

Resolutions were introduced and referred in the Senate, on the 2d inst., pledging the protection of the Government to the Nicaragua canal, and Senator Burnside made a speech reaffirming the Monroe doctrine in reference to this work. At its conclusion the Senate went into executive session, and, when the doors were opened, adjourned.......In the House two resolutions were introduced declaring it the opinion of the members that no change be made in the currency laws at this session; another in relation to the inter-oceanic canal; and several bills by unanimous consent, among which was one by Mr. Thompson, of Kentucky, on the reference of which to the Committee on War Claims, a vote resulted 114 to 111....Caucuses were held by Senators of both parties in relation to committee appointments. In the Republican caucus, Mr. Baldwin, the new Michigan Senator, was recommended to fill the place of his predecessor, Mr. Chandler, on the committees.

Senator Ferry presented the credentials of Henry P. Baldwin in the Senate on the 3d, and he took the oath of office. Mr. Beck introduced a bill to authorize the payment of customs duties in legal-tender notes; also, to authorize the purchase of foreign-built ships by Americans. Mr. Bayard offered a resolution that "notes of the United States shall be receivable for all dues to the United States, except duties on imports, and shall not be otherwise legal tender. Mr. Ingalls presented a resolution, "that the present volume of United States notes should not be reduced, and that said notes ought to continue to be a legal tender in the payment of debts."....Mr. Wood introduced a bill in the House limiting interest on refunding bonds to 3½ per cent. Bills introduced: By Mr. Weaver, for the relief of the soldiers and sailors who served in the late war; by Mr. Goode, relating to the celebration of the Yorktown centennial; by Mr. Finlay, transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department; by Mr. Garfield, to facilitate the refunding of the national debt....The following nominations were sent to the Senate by the President: Charles Beardsley, Iowa, to be Fourth Auditor of the Treasury. Collectors of Internal Revenue—L. B. Crocker, Second District of Illinois; Alfred M. Jones, Third District of Illinois; Howard M. Kutchin, Third District of Wisconsin. Indian Agents—Charles Hatton, Michigan, for the Shoshone Agency, Wyoming.

A short session was held in both houses on the 4th, and at its close they adjourned to the 8th. In the Senate a bill was introduced by Mr. Morrill to facilitate the funding of the public debt. Mr. Carpenter offered a resolution that, the present condition of financial affairs being excellent, no change was expedient. A number of private bills were offered, and a short executive session was held....In the House a resolution was presented by Mr. Gillette, declaring that Congress is not only opposed to any reduction in the volume of United States legal-tender notes, but is in favor of substituting greenbacks for national-bank notes, and that it is in favor of the free and unrestricted coinage of the 412½-grain silver dollars.

A chemist at Detroit has been examining the water of that city, and finds in it "various species of diatoms, such as the Nitzschia curvula, Cymatopleura solea, Cymatopleura elliptica, Stauroneis punctata, Pleurosigma spencerii, Rhizosolenia Eriensis." The inhabitants may exclaim with Hood, "Lave in it, drink of it then if you can."

THE MESSAGE

Annual Communication of President Hayes.

Read to Congress on Monday, Dec. 1.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives: The members of the Forty-sixth Congress have assembled in their first regular session under circumstances calling for mutual congratulation and grateful acknowledgment to the Giver of all good for the large and unusual measure of national prosperity which we now enjoy. The most interesting events which have occurred in our public affairs since my last annual message to Congress are connected with the financial operations of the Government directly affecting the business interests of the country.

Resumption.

I congratulate Congress on the successful execution of the Resumption act. At the time fixed, and in the manner contemplated by law, United States notes began to be redeemed in coin. Since the 1st of January last they have been promptly redeemed on presentation, and in all business transactions, public and private, in all parts of the country, they are received and paid out as the equivalent of coin. The demand upon the treasury for gold and silver in exchange for United States notes has been comparatively small, and the voluntary deposit of coin and bullion in exchange for notes has been very large. The excess of the precious metals deposited or exchanged for United States notes over the amount of United States notes redeemed is about $40,000,000.

The resumption of specie payments has been followed by a very great revival of business. With a currency equivalent in value to the money of the commercial world, we are enabled to enter upon an equal competition with other nations in trade and production. The increasing foreign demand for our manufactures and agricultural products has caused a large balance of trade in our favor, which has been paid in gold, from the 1st of July last to Nov. 15, to the amount of about $59,000,000.

Public Credit.

Since the resumption of specie payments there has been a marked and gratifying improvement of the public credit. The bonds of the Government bearing only 4 per cent. interest have sold at or above par, sufficient in amount to pay off all of the national debt which was redeemable under the present laws. The amount of interest saved annually by the process of refunding the debt since March 1, 1877, is $14,297,177. The bonds sold were largely in small sums, and the number of our citizens now holding the public securities is much greater than ever before. The amount of the national debt, which matures in less than two years, is $792,121,700, of which $500,000,000 bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. It is believed that this part of the public debt can be refunded by the issue of 4-per-cent. bonds, and by the reduction of interest which will thus be effected about $11,000,000 can be annually saved to the treasury. To secure this important reduction of interest to be paid by the United States, further legislation is required, which it is hoped will be provided by Congress during its present session. The coinage of gold by the mints of the United States during the last fiscal year was $40,986,912.

Silver Coinage.

The coinage of silver dollars since the passage of the act for that purpose up to Nov. 1, 1879, was $45,000,850, of which $12,700,344 have been issued from the treasury, and are now in circulation, and $32,300,506 are still in the possession of the Government. The pendency of the proposition for unity of action between the United States and the principal commercial nations of Europe to effect a permanent system for the equality of gold and silver in the recognized money of the world, leads me to recommend that Congress refrain from new legislation on the general subject. The great revival of trade, internal and foreign, will supply during the coming year its own instructions, which may well be awaited before attempting further experimental measures with the coinage. I would, however, strongly urge upon Congress the importance of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the coinage of silver dollars upon the present legal ratio. The market value of the silver dollar being uniformly and largely less than the market value of the gold dollar, it is obviously impracticable to maintain them at par with each other if both are coined without limit. If the cheaper coin is forced into circulation it will, if coined without limit, become the sole standard of value, and thus defeat the desired object, which is a currency of both gold and silver, which shall be of equivalent value, dollar for dollar, with the universally-recognized money of the world.

Legal Tenders.

The retirement from circulation of United States notes, with the capacity of legal tender in private contracts, is a step to be taken in our progress to a fair and stable currency, which should be accepted as the policy and duty of the Government and the interest and security of the people. It is my firm conviction that the issue of the legal-tender paper money, based wholly upon the authority and credit of the Government, except in extreme emergency, is without warrant in the constitution, and a violation of sound financial principles. The issue of United States notes during the late civil war, with the capacity of legal tender between private individuals, was not authorized except as a means of rescuing the country from imminent peril. The circulation of these notes as paper money for any protracted period of time after the accomplishment of this purpose was not contemplated by the framers of the laws under which they were issued. They anticipated the redemption and withdrawal of these notes at the earliest practicable period consistent with the attainment of the object for which they were provided.

Sinking Fund.

The policy of the United States steadily adhered to from the adoption of the constitution has been to avoid the creation of a national debt, and when, from necessity, in the time of war, debts have been created, they have been paid off on the return of peace as rapidly as possible. With this view, and for this purpose, it is recommended that the existing laws for the accumulation of a sinking fund sufficient to extinguish the public debt within a limited period be maintained. If any change of the objects or rates of taxation is deemed necessary by Congress, it is suggested that experience has shown that a duty can be placed on tea and coffee which will not enhance the price of those articles to the consumer, and which will add several millions of dollars annually to the treasury.

The Suppression of Polygamy.

The continued deliberate violation by a large number of the prominent and influential citizens of the Territory of Utah of the laws of the United States for the prosecution and punishment of polygamy demands the attention of every department of the Government. This Territory has a population sufficient to entitle it to admission as a State. The general interests of the nation, as well as the welfare of the citizens of the Territory, require its advance from the Territorial form of Government to the responsibilities and privileges of a State. This important change will not, however, be approved by the country while the citizens of Utah, in very considerable number, uphold a practice which is condemned as a crime by the laws of all civilized communities throughout the world. The law for the suppression of this offense was enacted with great unanimity by Congress more than seventeen years ago, but has remained until recently a dead letter in the Territory of Utah because of the peculiar difficulties attending its enforcement. The opinion widely prevailed among the citizens of Utah that the law was in contravention of the constitutional guarantee of religious freedom.

This objection is now removed. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided the law to be within the legislative power of Congress, and binding, as a rule of action, for all who reside within the Territories. There is no longer any reason for delay or hesitation in its enforcement. It should be firmly and effectively executed. If not sufficiently stringent in its provisions, it should be amended, and, in aid of the purpose in law, I recommend that more comprehensive and more searching methods for preventing as well as punishing this crime be provided. If necessary to secure obedience to the law, the enjoyment and exercise of the rights and privileges of citizenship in the Territories of the United States may be withheld or withdrawn from those who violate or oppose the enforcement of the law on this subject.

Popular Rights.

The elections of the past year, though occupied only with State offices, have not failed to elicit, in the political discussions which attended them all over the country, new and decisive evidence of the deep interest which the great body of citizens take in the progress of the country toward a more general and complete establishment, at whatever cost, of universal security and freedom in the exercise of the elective franchise. While many topics of political concern demand great attention from our people, both in the sphere of National and State authority, I find no reason to qualify the opinion I expressed in my last annual message, that no temporary or administrative interests of Government, however urgent or weighty, will ever displace the zeal of our people in defense of the primary rights of citizenship, and that the power of public opinion will override all political prejudices and all sectional and State attachments in demanding that all over our wide territory the name and character of citizens of the United States shall mean one and the same thing, and carry with them unchallenged security and respect. I earnestly appeal to the intelligence and patriotism of all good citizens of every part of the country, however much they may be divided in opinions on other political subjects, to unite in compelling obedience to existing laws aimed at the protection of the right of suffrage. I respectfully urge upon Congress to supply any defects in these laws which experience has shown, and which it is within its power to remedy. I again invoke the co-operation of the Executive and Legislative authorities of the States in this great purpose. I am fully convinced that if the public mind can be set at rest on this paramount question of popular rights, no serious object will thwart or delay the complete pacification of the country, or retard the general diffusion of prosperity.

Civil-service Reform.

In a former message I invited the attention of Congress to the subject of the reformation of the civil service of the Government, and expressed the intention of transmitting to Congress, as early as practicable, a report upon this subject by the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. In view of the fact that during a considerable period the Government of Great Britain has been dealing with administrative problems and abuses in various particulars analogous to those presented in this country and that, in recent years, the measures adopted were understood to have been effective and in every respect highly satisfactory, I thought it desirable to have fuller information upon the subject, and accordingly requested the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission to make a thorough investigation for this purpose. The result has been an elaborate and comprehensive report. The report sets forth the history of the partisan spoils system in Great Britain, and of the rise and fall of the Parliamentary patronage, and of official interference with the freedom of elections. It shows that, after long trials of various kinds of examinations, those which are competitive and open on equal terms to all, and which are carried on under the superintendence of a single commission, have with great advantage been established as conditions of admission to almost every official place in the subordinate administration of that country and of British India. The completion of the report, owing to the extent of the labor involved in its preparation, and the omission of Congress to make any provision either for the compensation or the expenses of the commission, has been postponed until the present time. It is herewith transmitted to Congress. While the measures of another Government are of no authority for us, they are entitled to influence to the extent to which their intrinsic wisdom and their adaptation to our institutions and social life may commend them to our consideration. The views I have heretofore expressed concerning the defects and abuses in our civil administration remain unchanged, except in so far as an enlarged experience has opened my sense of the duty both of officers and of the people themselves to co-operate for their removal. The grave evils and perils of a partisan-spoils system of appointment to office and office tenure are now generally recognized. In the resolutions of the great parties, in the reports of departments, in the debates and proceedings of Congress, in the messages of Executives, the gravity of these evils has been pointed out, and the need of their reform has been admitted. To command the necessary support, every measure of reform must be based on common right and justice, and must be compatible with the healthy existence of great parties, which are inevitable and essential in a free state. When the people have approved a policy at a national election, confidence on the part of the officers they have selected, and of the advisers who, in accordance with our political institutions, should be consulted in the policy which it is their duty to carry into effect, is indispensable. It is eminently proper that they should explain it before the people, as well as illustrate its spirit in the performance of their official duties. It hardly need be pointed out that very different considerations apply to the greater number of those who fill the subordinate places in the civil service. Their responsibility is to their superiors in official position. It is their duty to obey the legal instructions of those upon whom that authority is involved, and their best public service consists in the discharge of their functions irrespective of partisan politics. Their duties are the same whatever party is in power, and whatever policy prevails. As a consequence, it follows that their tenure of office should not depend upon the prevalence of any policy or the supremacy of any party, but should be determined by their capacity to serve the people most usefully, quite irrespective of partisan interests. The same consideration that should govern the tenure should also prevail in the appointment, discipline, and removal of these subordinates. The authority of appointment and removal is not a perquisite which may be used to aid a friend or reward a partisan, but is a trust to be exercised in the public interest, under all the sanctions which attend the obligation to apply the public funds only for public purposes. Every citizen has an equal right to the honor and profit of entering the public service of his country. The only just ground of discrimination is the measure of character and capacity he has to make that service most useful to the people.

Except in cases where, upon just and recognized principles, as upon the theory of pensions, offices and promotions are bestowed as rewards of past services, their bestowal upon any theory which disregards personal merit is an act of injustice to the citizen, as well as a breach of that trust subject to which the appointing power is held. In the light of these principles it becomes of great importance to provide just and adequate means, especially for every department and large administrative office, where personal discrimination on the part of its head is not practicable for ascertaining those qualifications to which appointments and removals should have reference. To fail to provide such means is not only to deny the opportunity of ascertaining the facts upon which the most righteous claim to office depend, but of necessity to discourage all worthy aspirants by handing over appointments and removals to mere influence and favoritism. If it is the right of the worthiest claimant to gain the appointment, and the interest of the people to bestow it upon him, it would seem clear that a wise and just method of ascertaining personal fitness for office must needs be an important and permanent function of every just and wise Government. It has long since become impossible in the great offices for those having the duty of nomination and appointment to personally examine into the individual qualifications of more than a small proportion of those seeking office, and with the enlargement of civil service that proportion must continue to become less. In the earlier years of the Government the subordinate offices were so few in number that it was easy for those making appointments and promotions to personally ascertain the merits of the candidates. Party managers and methods had then become powerful agents of coercion hostile to the free and just exercise of the appointing power. A large and [illegible] part of the duty of restoring the civil service to the desired purity and efficiency rests upon the President, and it is my purpose to do what is within my power to advance such prudent and gradual measures of reform as will most surely and rapidly bring about that radical change of system essential to make our administrative methods satisfactory to a free and intelligent people by a proper exercise of authority. It is in the power of the Executive to do much to promote such a reform, but it cannot be too clearly understood that nothing adequate can be accomplished without co-operation on the part of Congress and considerate and intelligent support among the people. Reforms which challenge the generally-accepted theories of parties and demand changes in the methods of departments are not the work of a day. Their permanent foundations must be laid in sound principles and in an experience which demonstrates their wisdom and exposes the errors of their adversaries. Every worthy officer desires to make his official action an honor to his country. But the people themselves, far more than their officers in public station, are interested in a pure, economical, and vigorous administration. By laws enacted in 1853 and 1855, and now in substance incorporated in the Revised Statutes, the practice of arbitrary appointments to the several subordinate grades in the great departments was condemned, and examinations as to capacity, to be conducted by the Departmental Boards of Examiners, were provided for and made conditions of admission to the public service. These statutes are a decision by Congress that examinations of some sort as to attainments and capacity are essential to the well-being of the public service. The important questions since the enactment of these laws have been as to the character of these examinations, and whether official favor and partisan influence or common right and merit were to control the access to the examinations. In practice these examinations have not always been open to worthy persons generally who might wish to be examined. Official favoritism and partisan influence, as a rule, appear to have designated those who alone were permitted to go before the examining boards, subjecting even the examiners to a pressure from the friends of the candidates very difficult to resist. As a consequence, the standard of admission fell below that which the public interest demanded. It was almost inevitable that a system which provided for various separate boards of examiners, with no common supervision or uniform method of procedure, should result in confusion, inconsistency, and inadequate tests of capacity highly detrimental to the public interest. A further and more radical change was obviously required. In the annual message of December, 1870, my predecessor declared that "there is no duty which so much embarrasses the Executive and heads of departments as that of appointments, nor is there any such arduous and thankless labor imposed on Senators and Representatives as that of finding places for constituents. The present system does not secure the best men, and often not even fit men, for the public places. The elevation and purification of the civil service of the Government will be hailed with approval by the whole people of the United States." Congress accordingly passed the act approved March 3, 1871, "To regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof," giving the necessary authority to the Executive to institute a civil-service reform. Acting under this statute, which was interpreted as intended to secure a system of just and effectual examinations under uniform supervision, a number of eminently competent persons were selected for the purpose, who entered with zeal upon the discharge of their duties, prepared with an intelligent appreciation of the requirements of the service, the regulations contemplated, and took charge of the examinations, and who, in their capacity as a board, have been known as the Civil Service Commission. Congress for two years appropriated the money needed for the compensation and for the expenses of carrying on the work of the commission. It appears from the report of the commission, submitted to the President in April, 1874, that examinations had been held in various sections of the country, and that an appropriation of about $25,000 would be required to meet the annual expenses, including salaries, involved in discharging the duties of the commission. The report was transmitted to Congress by special message of April 18, 1874, with the following favorable comment upon the labors of the commission: "If sustained by Congress, I have no doubt the rules can, after the experience gained, be so improved and enforced as to still more materially benefit the public service, and relieve the Executive, members of Congress, and the heads of departments from influences prejudicial to good administration. The rules, as they have hitherto been enforced, have resulted beneficially, as is shown by the opinions of the members of the Cabinet and their subordinates in the departments, and in that opinion I concur." And in the annual message of December of the same year similar views are expressed, and an appropriation for continuing the work of the commission again advised. The appropriation was not made, and, as a consequence, the active work of the commission was suspended, leaving the commission itself still in existence without the means therefore of causing qualifications to be tested in any systematic manner, or securing for the public service the advantages of competition upon any extensive plan. I recommended in my annual message of December, 1877, the making of an appropriation for the resumption of the work of the commission. In the meantime, however, competitive examinations, under many embarrassments, have been conducted within limited spheres in the executive departments in Washington, and in a number of the custom houses and postoffices of the principal cities of the country, with a view to further test their effects, and in every instance they have been found to be as salutary as they are stated to have been under the administration of my predecessor. I think the economy, purity and efficiency of the public service would be greatly promoted by their systematic introduction, wherever practicable, throughout the entire civil service of the Government, together with ample provision for their general supervision, in order to secure consistency and uniform justice.

Reports from the Secretary of the Interior, from the Postmaster General, from the Postmaster in the city of New York, where such examinations have been some time on trial, and also from the Collector of the Port, the Naval Officer and the Surveyor in that city, and from the Postmasters and Collectors in several of the other large cities, show that the competitive system, where applied, has in various ways contributed to improve the public service. The reports show that the results have been salutary in a marked degree, and that the general application of similar rules cannot fail to be of decided benefit to the service. The reports of the Government officers in the city of New York especially bear decided testimony to the utility of open competitive examinations in their respective offices, showing that these examinations, and the excellent qualifications of those admitted to the service through them, have had a marked incidental effect upon the persons previously in the service, and particularly upon those aspiring to promotion. There has been on the part of those latter an increased interest in the work, and a desire to extend acquaintance with it beyond a particular desk, and thus the morale of the entire force has been raised. The examinations have been attended by many citizens, who have had an opportunity to thoroughly investigate the scope and character of the tests, and the method of determining the results, and those visitors have, without exception, approved the modes employed, and several of them have publicly attested their favorable opinion. Upon such considerations, I deem it my duty to renew the recommendation contained in my annual message of December, 1877, requesting Congress to make the necessary appropriations for the resumption of the work of the Civil Service Commission. Economy will be promoted by authorizing a moderate compensation to persons in the public service who may perform extra labor upon or under the commission as the Executive may direct. I am convinced that if a just and definite test of merit is enforced for admission to the public service, and in making promotions, such abuses as removal without good cause and partisan and official interference with the proper exercise of the appointing power will in large measure disappear. There are other administrative abuses to which the attention of Congress should be asked in this connection. Mere partisan appointment and the constant peril of removal without cause very naturally lead to an absorbing and mischievous political activity on the part of those thus appointed, which not only interferes with the due discharge of official duty, but is incompatible with the freedom of elections. Not without warrant in the view of several of my predecessors in the Presidential office, directly in accordance with the law of 1871 already cited, I endeavored, by regulations made on the 22d of June, 1877, to put some reasonable limits to such abuses. It may not be easy, and it may never, perhaps, be necessary to define with precision the proper limit of political action on the part of Federal officers. But, while their right to hold and freely express their opinions cannot be questioned, it is very plain that they should neither be allowed to devote to other subjects the time needed for the proper discharge of their official duties, nor to use the authority of their office to enforce their own opinions, or to coerce the political action of those who hold different opinions. Reasons of justice and public policy quite analogous to those which forbid the use of official power for the oppression of the private citizen impose upon the Government the duty of protecting its officers and agents from arbitrary exactions. In whatever aspect considered, the practice of making levies for party purposes upon the salaries of officers is highly demoralizing to the public service and discreditable to the country. Though an officer should be as free as any other citizen to give his money in aid of his opinions or his party, he should also be as free as any other citizen to refuse to make such gifts. If salaries are but a fair compensation for the time and labor of the officers, it is gross injustice to levy a tax upon them. If they are made excessive in order that they may bear the tax, the excess is an indirect robbery of the public funds. I recommend, therefore, such a revision and extension of the present statutes as shall secure to those in every grade of official life or public employment the protection with which a great and enlightened nation should guard those who are faithful in its service.

Foreign Relations.

Our relations with foreign countries have continued peaceful. With Great Britain there are still unsettled questions, growing out of the local laws of the maritime provinces, and the action of provincial authorities deemed to be in derogation of rights secured by treaty to American fishermen. The United States Minister in London has been instructed to present a demand for $105,305.02 in view of the damages received by American citizens at Fortune bay on the 6th day of January, 1878. The subject has been taken into consideration by the British Government, and an early reply is anticipated. Upon the completion of the necessary preliminary examination, the subject of our participation in the provincial fisheries, as regulated by treaty, will at once be brought to the attention of the British Government with a view to an early and permanent settlement of the whole question, which was only temporarily adjusted by the treaty of Washington. Efforts have been made to obtain the removal of restrictions found injurious to the exportation of cattle to the United Kingdom. Some correspondence has also occurred with regard to the rescue and saving of life and property upon the lakes, which has resulted in important modifications of the previous regulations of the Dominion Government on the subject, in the interest of humanity and commerce.

In accordance with the joint resolution of the last session of Congress, Commissioners were appointed to represent the United States at the two International Exhibitions in Australia, one of which is now in progress at Sydney, and the other to be held next year at Melbourne. A desire has been expressed by our merchants and manufacturers interested in the important and growing trade with Australia that an increased provision should be made by Congress for the representation of our industries at the Melbourne Exhibition of next year, and the subject is respectfully submitted to your favorable consideration.

The assent of the Government has been given to the landing on the coast of Massachusetts of a new and independent transatlantic cable between France, by way of the French Island of St. Pierre and this country, subject to any future legislation of Congress on the subject. The conditions imposed, before allowing the connection with our shore to be established, are such as to secure its competition with any existing or future lines of marine cable, and preclude amalgamation therewith; to provide for entire equality of rights to our Government and people with those of France in the use of the cable, and prevent any exclusive possession of the privilege as accorded by France to the disadvantage of any future cable communication between France and the United States which may be projected and accomplished by our citizens. An important reduction of the present rates of communication with Europe, felt to be too burdensome to the interests of our commerce, must necessarily flow from the establishment of this competing line. The attention of Congress was drawn to the propriety of some general regulation by Congress of the whole subject of transmarine cables by my predecessor in his message of Dec. 7, 1875, and I respectfully submit to your consideration the importance of Congressional action in this matter.

The questions of grave importance with Spain, growing out of the incidents of the Cuban insurrection, have been for the most part happily and honorably settled. It may reasonably be anticipated that the commission now sitting in Washington for the decision of private cases in this connection will soon be able to bring its labors to a conclusion. The long-standing question of the East Florida claims has lately been renewed as a subject of correspondence, and may possibly require Congressional action for its final disposition.

A treaty with the Netherlands with respect to Consular rights and privileges similar to those with other powers has been signed and ratified, and the ratifications were exchanged on the 31st of July last.

Negotiations for extradition treaties with the Netherlands and with Denmark are now in progress.

Some questions with Switzerland in regard to pauper and convict emigrants have arisen, but it is not doubted that they will be arranged upon a just and satisfactory basis. A question has also occurred with respect to an asserted claim by Swiss municipal authorities to exercise tutelage over the persons and property of Swiss citizens naturalized in this country. It is possible this may require adjustment by treaty. With the German empire frequent questions arise in connection with the subjects of naturalization and expatriation, but the Imperial Government has constantly manifested a desire to strictly maintain and comply with all treaty stipulations in regard to them.

In consequence of the omission of Congress to provide for a diplomatic representation at Athens, the legation to Greece has been withdrawn. There is now no channel of diplomatic communications between the two countries, and the expediency of providing for one in some form is submitted to Congress. Relations with Austria, Prussia, Italy, Portugal, Turkey, and Belgium continue amicable, and marked by no incident of especial importance.

A change of the personal head of the Government of Egypt has taken place. No change, however, has occurred in the relations between Egypt and the United States.

The action of the Egyptian Government in presenting to the city of New York one of the ancient obelisks which possess such historical interest is highly appreciated as a generous mark of international regard. If prosperity should attend the enterprise of its transportation across the Atlantic, its erection in a conspicuous position in the chief commercial city of the nation will be soon accomplished.

The treaty recently made between Japan and the United States in regard to the revision of former treaties, it is now believed, will be followed by similar action on the part of other treaty powers. The attention of Congress is again invited to the subject of the indemnity funds received some years since from Japan and China, which, with their accumulated interest, now amount to considerable sums. If any part of these funds is justly due to American citizens, they should receive it promptly, and whatever may have been received by the Government in excess of strictly-just demands should in some form be returned to the nations to whom it equitably belongs. The Government of China has signified its willingness to consider the question of the emigration of its subjects to the United States with a dispassionate fairness and to co-operate in such measures as may tend to prevent injurious consequences to the United States. The negotiations are still proceeding, and will be pressed with diligence. A question having arisen between China and Japan about the Loochoo islands, the United States Government has taken measures to inform those powers of its readiness to extend its good offices for the maintenance of peace, if they shall mutually deem it desirable, and find it practicable to avail themselves of the proffer.

It is a gratification to be able to announce that, through the judicious and energetic action of the military commanders of the two nations on each side of the Rio Grande, under the instructions of their respective Governments, raids and depredations have greatly successful, and, in localities where they were formerly destructive, have now almost wholly ceased. In view of this result, I entertain a confident expectation of the continuance of the prevalence of quiet on the border of the two countries.

The third installment of the award against Mexico under the Claims Commission of July 4, 1868, was duly paid, and has been put in course of distribution in pursuance of the act of Congress providing for the same. This satisfactory situation between the two countries leads me to anticipate an expansion of our trade with Mexico, and an increased contribution of capital and industry by our people to the development of the great resources of that country. I earnestly commend to the wisdom of Congress the provision of suitable legislation looking to this result.

Diplomatic intercourse with Colombia is again fully restored by the arrival of the Minister from that country to the United States. This is especially fortunate in view of the fact that the question of an interoceanic canal has recently assumed an important aspect, and is now under discussion with the Central American countries, through whose territory the canal by the Nicaragua route would have to pass. It is trusted that enlightened statesmanship on their part will see that the early prosecution of such a work will largely inure to the benefit, not only of their own citizens and those of the United States, but of the commerce of the civilized world. It is not doubted that, should the work be undertaken under the protective auspices of the United States, and upon satisfactory concessions for the right of way and its security by the Central American Governments, the capital for its completion would readily be furnished from this country and Europe, which might, failing such guarantees, prove inaccessible. Diplomatic relations with Chili have also been strengthened by the reception of a Ministry from that country. The war between Peru, Bolivia, and Chili still continues. The United States has not deemed it proper to interpose in the matter, further than to convey to all the Governments concerned the assurance that the friendly offices of the Government of the United States for the restoration of peace upon an honorable basis will be extended in case the belligerents shall exhibit a readiness to accept them. Cordial relations continue with Brazil and the Argentine Republic, and trade with those countries is improving.

A provision for regular and more frequent mail communication in our ships between the ports of this country and the nations of South America seems to me to deserve the attention of Congress as an essential precursor of an enlargement of our commerce with them and an extension of our carrying trade.

A recent revolution in Venezuela has been followed by the establishment of a Provisional Government. This Government has not yet been formally recognized, and it is deemed desirable to await the proposed action of the people, which is expected to give it the sanction of constitutional forms.

A naval vessel has been sent to the Samoan islands to make surveys and take possession of the privileges ceded to the United States by Samoa in the harbor of Pago-Pago. A coaling station is to be established there, which will be convenient and useful to United States vessels.

The subject of opening diplomatic relations with Roumania and Servia, now become independent sovereignties, is at present under consideration, and is the subject of diplomatic correspondence.

There is a gratifying increase of trade with nearly all European and American countries, and it is believed that with judicious action in regard to its development it can and will be still more enhanced, and that American products and manufactures will find new and expanding markets. The reports of diplomatic and consular officers upon this subject, under the system now adopted, have resulted in obtaining much valuable information, which has been, and will continue to be, laid before Congress and the public from time to time.

Condition of Alaska.

The third article of the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867, by which Alaska was ceded to the United States, provides that the inhabitants of the ceded territory, with the exception of the uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty of property and religion. The uncivilized tribes are subject to such laws and regulations as the United States may from time to time adopt in regard to the aboriginal tribes of the country. Both the obligations of this treaty and the necessities of the people require that some organized form of government over the Territory of Alaska be adopted. There appears to be no law for the arrest of persons charged with common-law offenses, such as assault, robbery, and murder, and no magistrate authorized to issue or execute process in such cases. Serious difficulties have already arisen from offenses of this character, not only among citizens of the United States but of other countries who have engaged in mining, fishing, and other business operations within the Territory. A bill authorizing the appointment of Justices of the Peace and constables, and the arrest and detention of persons charged with criminal offenses, and providing for an appeal to United States courts for the District of Oregon of suitable cases will, at the proper time, be submitted to Congress.

Public Finances.

The attention of Congress is called to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the condition of the public finances. The ordinary revenues from all sources for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1879, were $273,827,184.46. The ordinary expenditures for the same period were $266,947,883.53, leaving a surplus revenue for the year of $6,879,300.93. The receipts for the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1880, actual and estimated, are as follows: Actual receipts for the first quarter, commencing July 1, 1879, $79,843,663.61; estimated receipts for the remaining three-quarters of the year, $208,156,336.39. Total receipts for the current fiscal year, actual and estimated, $288,000,000. The expenditures for the same period will be, actual and estimated, as follows: For the quarter commencing July 1, 1879, actual expenditures, $91,683,385.10. For the remaining three-quarters of the year the expenditures are estimated at $172,316,614.90, making the total expenditures $264,000,000, and leaving an estimated surplus revenue for the year ending June 30, 1880, of $24,000,000. The total receipts during the next fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, estimated according to existing laws, will be $288,000,000, and the estimated ordinary expenditures for the same period will be $278,097,364.39, leaving a surplus of $9,902,635.61 for that year. The large amount expended for arrears of pensions during the last and present fiscal years, amounting to $21,747,249.60, has prevented the application of the full amount required by law to the sinking fund for the current year, but, these arrears having been substantially paid, it is believed that the sinking fund can hereafter be maintained without any change of the existing law.

Army and Navy.

The Secretary of War reports that the War Department estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, are $40,380,428.93, the same being for a less sum of money than any annual estimate rendered to Congress from that department during a period of at least twelve years. He concurs with the General of the Army in recommending such legislation as will authorize the enlistment of the full number of 25,000 men for the line of the army, exclusive of the 3,460 men required for detached duty, and therefore not available for service in the field. He also recommends that Congress be asked to provide by law for the disposition of a large number of abandoned military posts and reservations, which, though very valuable in themselves, have been rendered useless for military purposes by the advance of civilization and settlement. He unites with the Quartermaster General in recommending that an appropriation be made for the construction of a cheap and perfectly fire-proof building for the safe storage of a vast amount of money, accounts, vouchers, claims and other valuable records, now in the Quartermaster General's office, and exposed to great risk of total destruction by fire. He also recommends, in conformity with the views of the Judge Advocate General, some declaratory legislation in reference to the military statute of limitation, as applied to the crime of desertion. In these several recommendations I concur.

The Secretary of War further reports that the work for the improvement in the South pass of the Mississippi river, under contract with Mr. James B. Eads, made in pursuance of an act of Congress, has been prosecuted during the past year with a greater measure of success in the attainment of results than during any previous year. The channel, through the south pass, which, at the beginning of June, 1875, had the depth of only seven and a half feet of water, had, on the 8th of July, 1879, a minimum depth of twenty-six feet, having a width of not less than twenty-five and a central depth of thirty feet. Payments have been made in accordance with the statute as the work progressed, amounting in the aggregate to $4,250,000, and further payments will become due, as provided by the statute and in the event of success in maintaining the channel now secured. The reports of the General of the Army and of his subordinates present a full and detailed account of the military operations for the repression of hostilities among the Indians of the Ute and Apache tribes, and praise is justly awarded to the officers and troops engaged for promptness, skill, and courage displayed. The past year has been one of almost unbroken peace and quiet on the Mexican frontier, and there is reason to believe that the efforts of this Government and Mexico to maintain order in that region will prove eminently successful.

This department was enabled during the past year to find temporary, though crowded, accommodations and a safe depository for a portion of its records in the completed East wing of the building designed for the State, War and Navy Departments. The construction of the North wing of the building—a part of the structure intended for the use of the War Department—is being carried forward with all possible dispatch, and the work should receive from Congress such liberal appropriation as will secure its speedy completion.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy shows continued improvement in that branch of the service during the last fiscal year. Extensive repairs have been made upon vessels, and two ships have been completed and made ready for sea. The total expenditure of the year ended June 30, 1879, including specific appropriations not estimated for by the department, were $13,555,710.09. The expenses chargeable to the year, after deducting the amount of these special appropriations, were $13,343,317.79; but this is subject to a reduction of $283,725.07, that amount having been drawn upon warrants, but not paid out during the year. The amount of appropriations applicable to the last fiscal year was $14,538,646.17. There was, therefore, a balance of $1,479,054.37 remaining unexpended and to the credit of the department on June 30, 1879. The estimates for the year ending June 30, 1881, are $14,864,147.95, which exceed the appropriations for the present fiscal year $361,897.28. The reason for this increase is explained in the Secretary's report. The appropriations available for the present fiscal year are $14,502,250.67, which will, in the opinion of the Secretary, answer all the ordinary demands of the service. The amount drawn from the treasury from July 1 to Nov. 1, 1879, was $5,770,404.12, of which $1,095,440.33 has been refunded, leaving as the expenditure for that period $4,674,963.79. If the expenditures of the remaining two-thirds of the year do not exceed the proportion for these four months, there will remain unexpended at the end of the year $477,359.30 of the current appropriations.

The report of the Secretary shows the gratifying fact that, among all the disbursing officers of the pay corps of the navy, there is not one who is a defaulter to the extent of a single dollar. I unite with him in recommending the removal of the Observatory to a more healthful location. That institution reflects credit upon the nation, and has obtained the approbation of scientific men in all parts of the world. Its removal from its present locality would not only be conducive to the health of its officers and professors, but would greatly increase its usefulness.

United States Marshals.

The appropriation for judicial expenses which has heretofore been made for the Department of Justice in gross was subdivided at the last session of Congress, and no appropriation whatever was made for the payment of the fees of Marshals and their deputies either in the service of process or for the discharge of other duties, and since July 30 these officers have continued the discharge of their duties without compensation from the Government, taking upon themselves the necessary incidental outlays as well as rendering their own services. In only a few unavoidable instances has the proper execution of the process of the United States failed by reason of the absence of the requisite appropriation. This course of official conduct on the part of the officers, highly creditable to their fidelity, was advised by the Attorney General, who informed them, however, that they would necessarily have to rely for their compensation upon the prospect of future legislation by Congress. I therefore especially recommend that immediate appropriation be made by Congress for this purpose. The act making the principal appropriation for the Department of Justice at previous sessions has uniformly contained the following clause: "And for defraying the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act approved Feb. 28, 1870, entitled 'An act to amend an act approved May 30, 1870,' entitled 'An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the United States, and for other purposes,' or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto." No appropriation was made for this purpose for the current year. As no general election of members of Congress occurred, the omission was a matter of little practical importance. Such election will, however, take place during the ensuing year, and the appropriation made for the pay of Marshals and deputies should be sufficient to embrace compensation for the services they may be required to perform at such elections.

The Courts.

The business of the Supreme Court is at present largely in arrears. It cannot be expected that more causes can be decided than are now disposed of in its annual session, or that by any assiduity the distinguished Magistrates who compose the court can accomplish more than is now done. In the courts of many of the circuits, also, the business has increased to such an extent that the delay of justice will call the attention of Congress to an appropriate remedy. It is believed that all is done in each circuit which can be fairly expected from its judicial force. The evils arising from delay are less heavily felt by the United States than by private suitors, as its causes are advanced by the courts when it is seen that they involve the discussion of questions of a public character. The remedy suggested by the Attorney General is the appointment of additional Circuit Judges, and the creation of an intermediate Court of Errors and Appeals, which shall relieve the Supreme Court of a part of its jurisdiction, while a larger force is also obtained for the performance of circuit duties. I recommend this suggestion to the consideration of Congress. It would seem to afford a complete remedy, and would involve, if ten additional Circuit Judges are appointed, an expenditure at the present rate of salaries of not more than $60,000 a year, which would certainly be small in comparison with the objects to be attained.

The Postoffice.

The report of the Postmaster General bears testimony to the general revival of business throughout the country. The receipts of the Postoffice Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, were $30,041,982.86, being $764,465.91 more than the revenues of the preceding year. The amount realized from the sale of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes and postal-cards was $764,465.91 more than in the preceding year, and $2,387,559.23 more than in 1877. The expenditures of the department were $33,449,899.45, of which the sum of $376,461.63 was paid on liabilities incurred in preceding years. The expenditures during the year were $801,209.77 less than in the preceding year. This reduction is to be attributed mainly to the operation of the law passed June 17, 1878, changing the compensation of Postmasters from a commission on the value of stamps sold to a commission on the stamps canceled. The amount drawn from the treasury on appropriations, in addition to the revenues of the department, was $3,031,454.96, being $2,276,197.56 less than in the preceding year. The expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, are estimated at $39,920,900, and the receipts from all sources at $32,210,000, leaving a deficiency to be appropriated for out of the treasury of $7,710,900. The relations of the department with the railroad companies have been harmonized, notwithstanding the general reduction by Congress of their compensation by the appropriation for special facilities, and the railway postal lines have been greatly extended, especially in the Southern States. The interests of the railway mail service would be greatly promoted and its expenditures could be readily controlled by the classification of the employes of the railway mail service as recommended by the Postmaster General, the appropriation for salaries, with respect to which the maximum limit is already fixed by law to be made in gross. The Postmaster General recommends an amendment to the law regulating an increase of compensation for increased service and increased speed on star routes, so as to enable him to advertise for such increased service and speed. He also suggests the advantages to accrue to the commerce of the country from the enactment of a general law authorizing contracts with American-built steamers carrying the American flag for transporting the mail between the United States and ports of the West Indies and South America at a fixed maximum price per mile, the amount to be expended being regulated by annual appropriations in like manner with the amount for the domestic star service. The arrangement made by the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury for the collection of duties on books received in the mail from foreign countries has proved so satisfactory in its practical operation that the recommendation is now made that Congress extend the provisions of the act of March 3, 1879, under which this arrangement was made, so as to apply to all other dutiable articles received in the mails from foreign countries.

The Indians.

The reports of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, setting forth the present state of our relations with the Indian tribes on our territory, the measures taken to advance the civilization and prosperity, and the progress already achieved by them, will be found of more than ordinary interest. The general conduct of our Indian population has been so satisfactory that the occurrence of two disturbances which resulted in bloodshed and destruction of property is all the more to be lamented. The history of the outbreak on the White River Ute Reservation in Western Colorado has become so familiar by elaborate reports in the public press that its remarkable incidents need not be stated here in detail. It is expected that the settlement of this difficulty will lead to such arrangements as will prevent further hostile contests between the Indians and the border settlements in Western Colorado. The other disturbance occurred at the Mescalero Agency in New Mexico, where Victoria, the head of a small band of marauders, after committing many atrocities, being vigorously chased by a military force, made his way across the Mexican border, and is now on a foreign soil. While these occurrences, in which a comparatively small number of Indians were engaged, are most deplorable, a vast majority of our Indian population have fully justified the expectations of those who believe that by humane and peaceful influences the Indian can be led to abandon the habits of savage life, and to develop a capacity for useful and civilized occupations. What they have already accomplished is shown in the pursuit of agricultural and mechanical work. The remarkable success which has attended the experiment of employing as freighters a class of Indians hitherto counted among the wildest and most intractable, and the general and urgent desire expressed by them for the education of their children, may be taken as sufficient proof that they will be found capable of accomplishing much more if they continue to be wisely and fairly guided. The Indian policy sketched in the report of the Secretary of the Interior, the object of which is to make liberal provision for the education of Indian youth, to settle the Indians upon farm-lots in severalty, to give them title in fee to their farms inalienable for a certain number of years, and when their wants are thus provided for to dispose by sale of the lands on their reservations not occupied and used by them, a fund to be formed out of the proceeds for the benefit of the Indians, which will gradually relieve the Government of the expenses now provided for by annual appropriations, must commend itself as just and beneficial to the Indians and as also calculated to remove those obstructions which the existence of large reservations presents to the settlement and development of the country. I, therefore, earnestly recommend the enactment of a law enabling the Government to give Indians a title in fee inalienable for twenty-five years to the farm lands assigned to them by allotment. I also repeat the recommendation in my first annual message that a law be passed admitting Indians who can give satisfactory proof of having, by their own labor, supported their families for a number of years, and who are willing to detach themselves from their tribal relations, to the benefit of the Homestead act, and to grant them patents containing the same provision of inalienability for a certain period.

The experiment of sending a number of Indian children of both sexes to the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute in Virginia, to receive elementary English education and practical instruction in farming and other useful industries, has led to results so promising that it was thought expedient to turn over the cavalry barracks at Carlisle, in Pennsylvania, to the Interior Department for the establishment of an Indian school on a larger scale. This school has now 158 pupils, selected from various tribes, and is in full operation. Arrangements are also made for the education of a number of Indian boys and girls belonging to tribes on the Pacific slope in a similar manner, at Forest Grove, in Oregon. These institutions will commend themselves to the liberality of Congress and to the philanthropic munificence of the American people.

Last spring information was received of the organization of an extensive movement in the Western States, the object of which was the occupation by unauthorized persons of certain lands in the Indian Territory ceded by the Cherokees to the Government for the purpose of settlement by other Indian tribes. On the 29th of April I issued a proclamation warning all persons against participation in such an attempt, and by the co-operation of a military force the invasion was promptly checked. It is my purpose to protect the rights of the Indian inhabitants of that Territory to the full extent of the Executive; but it would be unwise to ignore the fact that a Territory so large and so fertile, with a population so sparse, and so great a wealth of unused resources, will be found more exposed to the repetition of such attempts as happened this year when the surrounding States were most densely settled, and the westward movement of our population looks still more eagerly for fresh lands to occupy. Under such circumstances the difficulty of maintaining the Indian Territory in its present state will greatly increase, and the Indian tribes inhabiting it would do well to prepare for such a contingency. I therefore fully approve of the advice given to them by the Secretary of the Interior on a recent occasion to divide among themselves, in severalty, as large a quantity of their lands as they can cultivate, to acquire individual title in fee, instead of their present tribal ownership in common, and consider in what manner the balance of their lands may be disposed of by the Government for their benefit. By adopting such a policy they would more certainly secure for themselves the value of their possessions, and at the same time promote their progress in civilization and prosperity, than by endeavoring to perpetuate the present state of things in the Territory.

The question whether a change in the control of the Indian service should be made was, in the Forty-fifth Congress, referred to a joint committee of both houses for inquiry and report. In my last annual message I expressed the hope that the decision of the question, then in prospect, would arrest further agitation of this subject, such agitation being apt to produce a disturbing effect upon the service as well as the Indians themselves. Since then, the committee having reported, the question has been decided in the negative by a vote in the House of Representatives. For the reason here stated, and in view of the fact that further uncertainty on this point will be calculated to obstruct other much-needed legislation, to weaken the discipline of the service and to unsettle salutary measures now in progress for the government and improvement of the Indians, I respectfully recommend that the decision arrived at by Congress at its last session be permitted to stand.

Timber Thefts.

The efforts made by the Department of the Interior to arrest the depredations on the timber lands of the United States have been continued, and have met with considerable success. A large number of cases of trespass have been prosecuted in the courts of the United States. Others have been settled, the trespassers offering to make payment to the Government for the value of the timber taken by them. The proceeds of these prosecutions and settlements turned into the treasury far exceed in amount the sums appropriated by Congress for this purpose. A more important result, however, consists in the fact that the destruction of our public forests by depredation, although such cases still occur, has been greatly reduced in extent, and it is proposed that if the present policy is vigorously pursued, and sufficient protection to that end made by Congress, such trespasses—at least those on a large scale—can be entirely suppressed, except in the Territories, where timber for the daily requirements of the population cannot, under the present state of the law, be otherwise obtained. I therefore earnestly invite the attention of Congress to the recommendation made by the Secretary of the Interior, that a law be enacted enabling the Government to sell timber from the public lands without conveying the fee where such lands are principally valuable for the timber thereon, such sales to be so regulated as to conform to domestic wants and business requirements, while at the same time guarding against a sweeping destruction of the forests. The enactment of such a law appears to become a more pressing necessity every day.

Agricultural Bureau.

My recommendations in former messages are renewed in favor of enlarging the facilities of the Department of Agriculture. Agriculture is the leading interest and the permanent industry of our people. It is to the abundance of agricultural productions as compared with our home consumption, and the largely increased and highly-profitable market abroad which we have enjoyed in recent years that we are mainly indebted for our present prosperity as a people. We must look to its continued maintenance for substantial resources. There is no branch of industry in which labor, directed by scientific knowledge, yields such increased production in comparison with unskilled labor, and no branch of the public service to which the encouragement of liberal appropriations can be more appropriately extended. The omission to render such aid is not a wise economy, but on the contrary undoubtedly results in losses of immense sums annually that might be saved through well-directed efforts by the Government to promote this vital interest. The result already accomplished with the very limited means heretofore placed at the command of the Department of Agriculture is an earnest of what may be expected with increased appropriations for the several purposes indicated in the report of the Commissioner, with a view to placing the department upon a footing which will enable it to prosecute more effectively the objects for which it is established. Appropriations are needed for a more complete laboratory, for the establishment of a Veterinary Division and a Division of Forestry, and for an increase of force. The requirements for these and other purposes indicated in the report of the Commissioner, under the head of "Immediate Necessities of the Department," will not involve any expenditure of money that the country cannot with propriety now undertake in the interests of agriculture.

Education.

It is gratifying to learn from the Bureau of Education the extent to which educational privileges throughout the United States have been advanced during the year. No more fundamental responsibility rests upon Congress than that of devising appropriate measures of financial aid to education, supplemental to local action in States and Territories, and in the District of Columbia. The wise forethought of the founders of our Government has not only furnished the basis for the support of the common-school systems of the newer States, but laid foundations for the maintenance of their universities, of colleges of agriculture and mechanic art. Measures in accordance with this traditional policy for the further benefit of all these interests and the extension of some advantages to every portion of the country, it is hoped, will receive your favorable consideration.

Capitol Library.

To preserve and perpetuate the national literature should be among the foremost cares of the national Legislature. The library gathered at the Capitol still remains unprovided with any suitable accommodations for its rapidly-increasing stores. The magnitude and importance of the collection, increased, as it is, by the deposits made under the laws of copyright, by domestic and foreign exchanges, and by the scientific library of the Smithsonian Institution, call for building accommodations which shall be at once adequate and fire-proof. The location of such public buildings, which should provide for the pressing necessities of the present and for the vast increase of the nation's books in the future, is a matter which addresses itself to the discretion of Congress. It is earnestly recommended as a measure which should unite all suffrages, and which should no longer be delayed.

Washington Monument.

The Joint Commission created by the act of Congress of Aug. 2, 1876, for the purpose of supervising and directing the completion of the Washington National monument, of which commission the President is a member, has given careful attention to this subject, and already the strengthening of the foundation has so far progressed as to insure entire success of this part of the work. A massive layer of masonry has been introduced below the original foundation, widening the base, increasing the stability of the structure, and rendering it possible to carry the shaft to completion. It is earnestly recommended that such further appropriation be made for the continued prosecution of the work as may be necessary for the completion of this national monument at an early day.

District of Columbia.

In former messages, impressed with the importance of the subject, I have taken occasion to recommend to Congress the adoption of a generous policy toward the District of Columbia. The report of the Commissioners of the District herewith transmitted contains suggestions and recommendations, to all of which I earnestly invite your careful attention. I ask your early and favorable consideration of the views which they express as to urgent need of legislation for the reclamation of the marshes of the Potomac and its eastern branch within the limits of the city, and for the repair of streets of the capital, heretofore laid with wooden blocks, and by delay rendered almost impassable and a source of imminent danger to the health of its citizens. The means at the disposal of the Commissioners are wholly inadequate for the accomplishment of these important works and should be supplemented by timely appropriations from the Federal treasury. The filling of the flats in front of the city will add to the adjacent lands and parks now owned by the United States a large and valuable domain, sufficient, it is thought, to reimburse its entire cost, and will also, as an incidental result, secure the permanent improvement of the river for the purpose of navigation.

The constitution having invested Congress with supreme and exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, its citizens must, of necessity, look to Congress alone for all needful legislation affecting their interests, and as the territory of this District is the common property of the people of the United States, who, equally with its resident citizens, are interested in the prosperity of their capital, I cannot doubt that you will be amply sustained by the general voice of the country in any measure you may adopt for this purpose.

I also invite the favorable consideration of Congress to the wants of the public schools of this District, as exhibited in the report of the Commissioners. While the number of pupils is rapidly increasing, no adequate provision exists for a corresponding increase of school accommodation, and the Commissioners are without the means to meet this urgent need. A number of the buildings now used for school purposes are rented, and are in important particulars unsuited for the purpose. The cause of popular education in the District of Columbia is surely entitled to the same consideration at the hands of the National Government as in the several States and Territories, to which munificent grants of the public lands have been made for the endowment of schools and universities.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

TO REMOVE DANDRUFF.—Wash the hair thoroughly in rain water, with a good deal of borax dissolved in it.

PUMPKIN-PIE MADE OF SQUASH.—Take a good-sized crooked-necked squash, one-quarter of a pound of butter to a milk-pan of squash. Sweeten to taste. A bottle of cream; one quart of milk, unless too thin. Season with mace, a little nutmeg, brandy and rose-water. One dozen eggs and a little salt—eggs beaten.

A CURE FOR STAMMERING.—A correspondent says: Go into a room where you will be quiet and alone; get some book that will interest but not excite you, and read for two hours slowly, keeping your teeth together. Do the same thing every two or three days, or once a week, if very tiresome, always taking care to read slowly and distinctly, moving the lips, but not the teeth.

A NICE DISH.—Two eggs, one pint of milk, bakers' bread—as it is more porous—cut into thin slices; dip the bread into the batter and fry each side brown in butter. Then boil one cup of sugar in two cups of water, and, after adding vanilla or lemon flavoring, pour over the bread, and cover dish so as to steam and keep hot. It is well to reserve part of the sauce to put on each slice when serving.

TO MAKE ROCK CAKES.—Break six eggs in a basin, beat them till very light; add one pound of pounded sugar, and when this is well mixed with the eggs dredge in gradually half a pound of flour; add a few currants. Mix all well together, and put the dough with a fork on the baking-tin, making it look as rough as possible. Bake the cakes in a moderate oven for half an hour. When done allow them to cool, and store them away in a tin canister in a dry place.

TO SOFTEN HARD WATER.—Take two pounds of washing soda and one pound of common lime, and boil in five gallons of water for two or three hours; then stand away to settle, and dip off the clear water from the top and put into a jug. Can be used for washing dishes or cleaning, and one teacupful in a boiler of clothes, put in after the water is hot, will whiten the clothes and soften the water, without injury to the hands or clothes. I use an old iron pot to make it in.

SWEET POTATO PUDDING.—Ingredients: Two pounds of raw sweet potato, half pound of brown sugar, one-third of a pound of butter, one gill of cream, one grated nutmeg, a small piece of lemon-peel, and four eggs. Boil the potato well and mash thoroughly, passing it through a colander; while it is warm mix in sugar and butter; beat eggs and yelks together, and add when the potato is cold; add a table-spoonful of sifted flour; mix in the grated lemon-peel and nutmeg very thoroughly; butter a pan, and bake twenty-five minutes in a moderately hot oven. May be eaten with wine sauce.

Emperor and Father.

The following incident is related of the Grand Duke Alexis of Russia. Soon after he was assigned to duty as midshipman, his vessel was wrecked off the coast of Denmark. The Admiral commanding resolved to save the young man, and ordered him to take charge of the first boat which put off from the doomed ship. The Grand Duke disdained safety thus bought, and declined.

"My duty is here," he said to the Admiral, "and I must be the last to leave the ship."

"Do you not understand, sir," exclaimed the Admiral, "that you are under my command? and do you dare refuse obedience to my orders?"

"I know my duty," answered the midshipman, "and I will obey any orders you may see fit to give me, except an order to leave the ship, where my duty now commands me to remain."

The Admiral gave up his point, and Alexis was the last man to leave the ship, and, after landing, was promptly ordered under arrest for disobedience of orders. He submitted without a murmur. The Admiral sent dispatches to the Emperor detailing the affair, and the Emperor wrote:

"I approve your having placed the Midshipman Alexis under arrest for disobedience, and I bless my boy for having disobeyed."

A True Republican.

M. Grevy, President of the French republic, is one of the most unostentatious and good-humored of men. Although always a well-dressed man, he would insist on wearing a soft, black felt wide-awake, till he became Chief of the state, when his constitutional advisers made it a Cabinet question that he should invest in a tall hat. He gave in with a sigh. They tell an anecdote of him that is quite characteristic. Unlike most official Frenchmen, he believes enough in his own country to invest in her funds, and the other day went to the Bank of France to receive his dividends. He was already President of the republic, yet he quietly placed himself in the queue and waited his turn, sandwiched between a petty employe and a green-grocer's wife. Suddenly a high official of the bank espied him, but was scarcely able to believe his own eyes, and when he did almost fainted with horror. The President was forthwith accosted with all honors, and bidden to quit the queue, that his money might be paid him at once. "Many thanks," he answered, "but I really don't mind waiting." And the Chief Magistrate of the republic—a true liberal in every sense of that word—quietly bided his time. The humblest citizen was not to lose a moment of time on his account.

Fergus Ferguson's Creed.

Rev. Fergus Ferguson, having been arraigned before the United Presbyterian Synod of Scotland, on the charge of heresy, recently condensed his idea of Christian orthodoxy into the following six points:

"There is a God; man is a being made in the image and after the likeness of God; Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and the Savior of the world; the church, as the body of Christ, is the organization in which the spirit of God fitly dwells, and by which, therefore, the mind of God, as contained in the sacred scriptures, may be most fully and clearly made known to the world in order that the world might be brought back to God; and that the Bible is the Word of God."

A Sample Case.

In 1863, a malignant form of erysipelas suddenly broke out in one of the largest surgical wards of the Asylum Hospital at Baton Rouge, La., which contained at that time over 600 patients.

The physician in charge and the Medical Inspector in the United States Army having made a thorough examination of the hospital, outbuildings and entire inclosure, found everything scrupulously neat and clean, and could discover no cause for the outbreak. But on going outside of the inclosure they found that, in consequence of a defect in the drain, the water in which the soiled garments and bed-clothes of the patients were cleaned, had poured out and spread over an acre of ground.

Here was the cause. The germs of the disease, having multiplied a thousand-fold in the accumulated filth, were taken up and borne by the wind to the hospital. And it was a corroborative fact that those occupying beds nearest the overflow were the first infected; and that from these the disease spread from bed to bed. On removing the cause the epidemic was arrested.

A Dangerous Talent.

Next to a gift for inventing, there is scarcely any more dangerous than that of a talent for singing, especially in the case of a woman. In a fatal hour a girl of 16 is pronounced by some one reputed an authority on such points to have a magnificent voice. Visions of a future Grisi or Gerster are aroused in the breast of her family, and it is presently assumed that, if she can but be furnished with adequate instruction for a few years, rivulets of gold will begin to flow in. Thereupon the resources of the family are concentrated on the prima donna of the future, whose voice, in ninety-nine cases out of 100, so far from rivaling the stars of the opera-house, scarcely enables her, after hard toil and a world of trouble, temptation and mortification, to earn her livelihood.

A Cruel Husband.

"Did you wipe your feet on the mat, Fred, as you came in?" "Well, no, I didn't, deary. I thought—" "That's just like you; coming right in on this brand-new carpet without once thinking of the labor it costs to—" "But I thought, my own one—" "Yes, I suppose you did think, but not as you should have, or you wouldn't have come in on such a muddy day without wiping your feet." "But I thought—there, now, let me finish—I thought, you know, it would do if I wiped my shoes on the mat, and deferred wiping my feet until I'd shelled off the outside wrappers and there was a towel handy." Alas! for the evasion! She could forgive him all but that.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY
EDITORS.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS.

Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

"NO SOLID SOUTH, NO SOLID NORTH, BUT A SOLID UNION."

In this issue of the COURIER will be found the president's message in full. Also, the annual reports of the several departments and bureaus of the government.

◆

The Decatur Democrat says that Mr. Tilden "does nothing to create a boom in his own behalf." Which is proof sufficient that the editor of the Democrat knows nothing about Mr. Tilden.

◆

In declining to allow the use of his name as a presidential candidate, Mr. Seymour said:

"When I see tottering gray-beards, about the edge of the grave, engaged in a scramble for place and power, I am reminded of Holbein's 'Dance of Death.' I have a morbid horror of such a picture, and I shall never be found making one in such a cotillion."

◆

Our own statesmen, Mr. T. A. Hendricks, is rather fast for a prudent man. He would appear to much better advantage by not declining the vice presidency before he is asked to accept it. It seems that Mr. Hendricks is not "in the hands of his friends."—Decatur Democrat.

If we are not greatly mistaken the Democrat itself has repeatedly insisted upon the nomination of the old ticket. So has every other Tilden paper. For the information of our bombastic Buckeye friend, we beg leave to say that "our own statesman" was the candidate for the vice presidency on that ticket.

◆

Hayes' and Sherman's recomendations as to the finances of the country, have knocked the bottom out of the Sherman boom for president in Indiana. Jayhawker (republican) says that "The republicans could have carried Indiana three weeks ago by five thousand majority, on the issues as they then stood. To-day they could not carry it by thirty thousand votes for Sherman, and, perhaps, Blaine would lose it by ten thousand votes." Hon. John C. New, chairman of the republican state central committee, and late treasurer of the United States, says: "I do not indorse Mr. Sherman's recommendations on the finances. God, good crops, and the industry of the people have made the greenback worth as much as the gold dollar, but Mr. Sherman is trying to create the impression that he did it. He did not approve the Silver Bill, but he afterwards addmitted that he was wrong. The whole influence of the treasury department has been against the Silver Act."

Col. W. R. Holloway thinks Sherman made "A devil of a mistake. The return to good times has been rapid under the present financial system, and any meddling with it is not only dangerous, but criminal, if it should bring a collapse. Mr. Sherman has busted himself so far as Indiana is concerned. With his financial views he could not be elected township trustee in this state."

Another influential Indiana republican is of the opinion that "Hayes should remove Sherman from his cabinet, for it is now evident that he is the tool of the few men who can control the gold of the country, and he is trying to squeeze the value of all the property in this nation down to the compass of the gold which the gang could by."

That leaves Grant cock of the walk in Indiana, with Blaine a good second, so far as the republicans are concerned.

HAZZARD IN LIMBO.

The Government's Guardian Angels Hovering 'round Him.

A Deputy U. S. Marshal Escorts Him Back to Back.

It will be remembered that one Geo. Hazzard was once a resident of Auburn; that he was interested in the First National Bank; that he swindled a number of our citizens to the tune of several thousand dollars; that he was indicted by the grand jury of DeKalb county eight several times; that he went into bankruptcy, and filed false schedules and swore to the correctness of the same. For this last offense he was indicted by the United States grand jury, gave bond for his appearance in the United States circuit court at Indianapolis, and failing to appear at the time set for trial Judge Gresham declared the bond forfeited and ordered Hazzard's arrest for the violation of federal laws. A deputy United States marshal went to Chicago last Saturday to arrest Hazzard, but found him in charge of the notorious constable Geo. Hartman on some trumped up charge in order to evade the authority of the federal court. On Tuesday morning the U. S. marshal swore out a warrant for the arrest of the constable and Hazzard's nefarious gang of attorneys, all of whom were concerned in the conspiracy to obstruct the federal laws. Hazzard was surrendered to the United States authorities and taken to Indianapolis. His gang of hired conspirators were each placed under bond of $1,000 for their appearance for preliminary examination on Friday morning. Hazzard longs to see his bosom friend, the Hon, (?) E. Henderson.

EDUCATIONAL COLUMN.

By Prof. W. H. MacIntosh.

TEACHING WITH SYSTEM.

To KEEP school, the master rings his bell and boys and girls rush tumultuously into the school-house, noisily seize upon their books and slates, and then look around the room.

A noisy call to class is followed by the heavy tramp of feet, and the first to arrive seat themselves and allow others to pass them with an occasional stumble over out-stretched feet, or slide themselves sideways along the seat.

There is no attention to position of the body, neither on the part of those at seat or class. Books are held as owners choose and the master does most of the talking.

As there is little study, there is not much to recite, and classes are dismissed no wiser than when called. The routine goes rapidly on, reading classes succeed each other and the hour for recess comes. Following like an explosion—the signal—a rude throng hasten from their seats and divide near the door, some to take a lunch from their dinner, others to gain the open air, which fact is made known by outcries which may be heard a half mile away.

Other divisions of the school-day are but a repetition of profitless exercises, and night comes to close the costly folly.

To TEACH school, the qualified, earnest young person has examined over night and planned his day's work. He has anticipated obscure points in lessons, determined their length according to the ability of his pupils and comes to his work with resolution to help his school onward.

His floor is swept clean, a small supply of stove-wood is neatly piled by the stove, an old broom stands by the door for use in removing dirt from boot or shoe, the room is warm and the atmosphere is pure. As the children come in they remove their hat or cap and take seats or go out to play until the near approach of school-time.

The teacher greets his pupil kindly and they reply with respect. The signal for the session is quietly answered; pupils seated in quiet, listen while the teacher reads a few verses from the Scripture. In some schools a short song follows and then a low, distinct signal directs the attention to study. A few minutes pass, then a class rising, passes with careful step to recitation, and all sit at once. Interest is centered on recitations and attention is close and general. The teacher observes disorder or noisy study and instantly arrests the recitation, a general silence succeeds and a firm authoritative gaze compels order and a resumption of study.

Intermission arrives and the girls pass out in order; five minutes later the boys also have recess, the teacher observing the sports indulged and notes behavior. An injury is redressed, rudeness is checked and language, when bad, is sternly rebuked. Again in the schoolroom until the small clock over the blackboard indicates the hour of noon. Now, certain ones distribute dinner baskets and children are grouped by families to quietly and with cheerful talk take their mid-day meal. Fragments are replaced in the baskets and then out to play.

Chance passers by addressing children receive respectful reply. Again at work, books and slates are moved with care, the lips give out no whispered sound. Small children print their lessons, make figures and when their last short lesson is heard are excused—where parents do not object—a half hour before the larger ones.

School apparatus that can be used, is used. The map of Indiana is daily brought into use for a few minutes to locate town and city and name of county. The teacher himself learns for the lesson the location of half a dozen counties and their county-seat. He at the stated time points them out, names them, teaches them, and by the close of the term his school is acquainted with the position of many counties. A dissected map is used in learning boundaries and comparative areas, and Webster's unabridged dictionary is in constant use correcting pronunciation and supplying definitions.

An effort is begun and continued till successful to secure the use of approved text books. Ray's ancient arithmetics and McNally's obsolete geographies are exchanged for the modern French and the approved Harper series of text books. Classes are increased in size and diminished in number. The teacher makes out the work of a month, equalizes the lessons, endeavors to make the subjects understood and on the last week of each month holds examination. Each pupil is carefully examined in what he has gone over and a correct and complete record is made of the result. A grade is given; children are instructed that 90 per cent. in a branch, has reference only to the scholarship of the pupil in that part gone over during the month. The teacher begins by grading justly, and the record becomes of value in proportion as it is actually true.

The teacher keeps his register in ink only. Once a week he copies from his informal record on loose paper, into the register; the work is done neatly and completely, and may be relied upon as accurate, since done with care.

As trustee, or superintendent, or patron visits the school, the register, grade book and programme are examined, and their condition and information disclose the organization and conduct of the school.

The teacher expends effort upon classes, not individuals. It is as easy to instruct a score as a single person, and time is saved by it. There is no rule for the number of classes, but teachers blunder when there are more than twenty-four. Arrangement for study between recitations is advisable.

All good schools employ a system of signals, which are of great value in securing order when implicitly obeyed. The tap of a pencil, distinct not loud, is cheap and practicable. The method by count or by word is good, but not the best.

The skilled, competent teacher has the ability to secure good recitations from pupils, and this is a considerable element of success. He does this to a great degree in three ways: by assigning lessons which the children can learn; by doing this work with care, showing how to study them, and by letting the class do their own reciting.

Continual review is necessary to fix facts in mind. Teaching is valuable according to its thoroughness. "Going through" books does children very little good.

If county and state geography, fundamental arithmetic, plain writing, correct spelling and natural reading were mastered, all other education would depend upon the energy of the pupil. Education does not perfect the morals and intellect, but it presents the necessity and advantages, lays the foundation and leaves each person to become the arbiter of his own destiny. The attempt to carry a youth into position, is illustrated in the collegiate course, which bears him on through class after class to the close of the senior year, honors him at commencement and then dropping him sees him fall into obscurity from which few emerge. Selfsustaining education inspires with courage, shows inherent power and sends the youth into action with few but well-mastered principles which are sources of strength and rules for guidance.

Combining a knowledge of human nature with system, there is pleasure to the teacher and interest to children in the continuance and execution of plans for controlling, guiding and influencing to a beneficent purpose the movements of mind. The more force can be concealed and voluntary assistance given, the heartier will be the support children will give their teacher. Adroit management, ingenious contrivance and unwavering resolution will cause children to act from momentary selfinterest, and the genuine live teacher will find a large amount of enjoyment and increasing interest in planning his work, and employing the very vigor of life in his pupils, to efficient means of improving them and adding to his reputation as a skillfull, ingenious and enterprising teacher.

We see by the Indianapolis Democrat and several other papers that Major Edgar Henderson, of this city, is spoken of as auditor of state in case General Mahlon D. Manson, the old warrior, is nominated for governor. We do not know whether Major Henderson is a candidate for any office or not, but should he ever be placed on a state ticket he would run far ahead of the ticket in this locality, and make a mighty lively campaign and as Madison county has never yet had a candidate on the state ticket, in case of the change spoken of above the democracy of the state would do well to look this way for a candidate.

Henderson; that name sounds familiar, about as much so as Hazzard, and the two are about on an equality in this community. Mr. Henderson could count on his fingers all the votes he would get in DeKalb county.

Cupp's Corners

Some time ago I sent you a few items of neighborhood news, and among the rest I gave the particulars of the golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. David Krider. In doing so I used no personalities, and I am sure I did not intend to offend any one. The COURIER of last week contains the following:

"Somebody has got after 'Rural,' our last week's correspondent from Cupp's Corners, and he should be on his guard at all times, for the following was received in a lady's hand-writing:

'EDITORS COURIER:—We think Bro. Rural made an ass of himself corresponding from Cupp's Corners and reporting the golden wedding. Make a few more corrections and then blow your big nose, Bro. Rural.'"

Now, Messrs. Editors, I think comment on the above is unnecessary. Your lady (?) correspondent is undoubtedly a very hightoned, moral and chaste (?) young lady, and would make a fortune writing for a Sunday-school paper. As to the big nose, I would not take a thousand dollars for it, it is a GREAT DEAL better than none. The allwise Creator in His goodness and mercy gave me that big nose to blow, and I am going to blow it whenever it needs blowing, dear sister. RURAL.

Executor's Sale.

Notice is hereby given, that by virtue of an order of the DeKalb circuit court, the undersigned, executor of the last will and testament of Emily Fuller, deceased, will sell at private sale, the following premises in DeKalb county, in the state of Indiana, to-wit: The north west quarter of the south west quarter of section two, (2), in township number thirty-three, (33), north of range thirteen, (13), east, containing forty acres more or less.

TERMS: One third cash, the residue in two equal payments at twelve and eighteen months, the deferred payments to be secured by notes and mortgage on said premises, said notes to draw interest at six per cent., and waive valuation and appraisement laws. Proposals for the purchase of said premises will be received by me at my residence in said county until Saturday the 3rd day of January, 1880, at ten o'clock A. M., when said premises will be sold to the highest and best bidder, provided said bid is not less than appraised value of said premises.

HENRY HINES, Executor.

Educational Correspondence.

EDITORS COURIER:—

I notice that you have an educational column in your paper, and although you do not say so, I presume that it is open to all who wish to contribute. I noticed and article in last weeks paper headed "Scholarship in teachers." Now, while I would not say one word that would in any way cast a reflection upon our worthy superintendent, or any one officer, I do intend to take the part of the teachers in what I may say. I have followed teaching most of the time for eight years. And during all that time the teacher has been continually urged to improve himself for his work, and I presume I shall continue to hear it, for the officers are paid to parade this before the teachers. And while I have heard so much, I have seen enough to convince me that they HAVE improved. If our schools are better, it is because the teachers are better, and that they are better, no one who understands anything of our school system, will deny. What a change in methods, what a difference in the order and general deportment of the scholars, what thorough training in "good morals and gentle manners." In fact, where is there no improvement? And all of this has been brought about by the teacher. There has been a greater change for the better during the last ten years than for twenty before, and I trust that the advancement will continue as great for twenty years to come, for there is yet room. But while this is true of the teacher, while we have been made to feel the effects of the teachers work, we should ask ourselves, "What have we done for the teacher? What has been the recompense of the one who has brought about so much good? Now, Messrs. officers, candidly, do you think you have made any change for the better during this time? Judging by my own experience, (hope others have been more appreciated,) I should think that if there has been any improvement it has been backward. At the time I first commenced my first term of school, I could not have worked an example in cube root if it would have saved me from the gallows, and could not have parsed a noun for a farm. Yet, I received $28.00 per month and board, (boarding around) while for the past four years I have been marked 100 per cent in experience, and now hold a two year's license from one of DeKalb county's test examinations, and the other day I was offered $35 per month and board myself. Now, where have I gained anything beyond self satisfaction in being able to handle a good school, and in giving satisfaction to patrons? And is my experience different from that of others of long experience? Would not they all say the same thing? I will not ask teachers if my experience is not theirs, but the officers themselves. Do you think you have done anything to encourage the teachers? Has our worthy superintendent (whose ability and energy we all admire,) been as energetic in his endeavors to bring the recompense of the teacher to that standard which will be proportionate with the requirements? If he has he surely is an exceptional school officer. I heard one trustee of this county say, that he would not pay over $25 per month for the best of teachers. Another, in Steuben county, during the last spring term, paid his teachers $1.50 and $2.00 per week, and yet his name was attached to a circular urging teachers to organize and maintain a county library. Grand encouragement he offered, was'nt it? And so we might go on to the end of the chapter. The truth of the matter is, the officers drive the teachers out of the profession as soon as they become well enough qualified to become a real success in the school room, as they are then prepared for something that will pay them better. But financial recompense is not all a teacher should have. They should receive the same honor and respect that is shown the other professions, and if there is honor to be conferred let some one be chosen from the ranks of the active teachers. But is this done? How many county superintendents in the state of Indiana are chosen from among the teachers? Not over one-third of them. Officers, did you ever think of this? There has been too much "privates doing the work and the officers receiving the credit" in the teachers profession, and it is time that the teachers were waking up to their interests. There is not a state in the Union which has a better school system than Indiana, if carried out as was the intention of our law makers. The laws are all right, and we haven't one word of complaint, but it is the executors who are to blame. The teachers have always been ready and are still ready and willing to conform to all the requirements of the law. But, notwithstanding all that they have done and what they are still doing, if there happens to be a vacancy in the superintendency or any other honor to be conferred, some briefless lawyer or retired editor steps in ahead of the teacher, even though it has to become a political scheme to accomplish the end.

I hope nothing I have said will be so construed as to be detrimental to the cause of education, but will cause officers to look upon the other side of the question for a while, and see if they have done all in their power to recompense the teachers of our common schools in proportion to their requirements. A TEACHER.

In matter of public highway petitioned for by Benjamin Kiplinger, the following reviewers were appointed to assess the damages that D. D. Miser and O. A. Kingsly will sustain by the location of said road, viz: O. P. Learned, Talma Rummel and John Stearns. Old reviewers discharged.

Messrs. J. J. Latson, James Griswold and Rob't S. S. Reed, appointed to view a proposed highway petitioned for by Jeremiah Lewis et. al., to report Dec. 5th, 1879.

In matter of highway in Union township petitioned for by Adam C. Brown et. al. the reviewers report favorable, and the road is declared established to the width of 40 feet.

In matter of proposed public highway in Concord township, petitioned for by A. M. Dermott et. al. the viewers report against the utility of the proposed road.

The reviewers on a proposed public highway, petitioned for by B. F. Cornelius et. al. in Troy township, report favorable to location, whereupon E. M. Coll by his attorneys, files his motion to set aside the report of the viewers, which motion is sustained by the board.

The viewers appointed to view a proposed public highway petitioned for by Jeremiah Lewis et. al. report in favor of location, and the road was declared established to the width of 40 feet.

The reviewers appointed to assess the damages that Eva Snyder would sustain in consequence of the location of a public highway petitioned for by Lewis Weaver, et. al. report damages to the amount of $20.00, which is ordered to be paid out of the county treasury, and the road is declared established to the width of 40 feet.

The viewers appointed to review a proposed highway in Troy township, petitioned for by B. F. Cornelius, et. al. report in favor of location. Upon motion of E. M. Coll by his attorneys, the report of the viewers was dismissed by the board for irregularities, and the viewers were remanded to make another view.

Proceedings in the following ditch cases were ordered continued.

Hugh Watt, et. al., Union and Richland townships; John A. Hartman, Richland township; Nathan Elliott, et. al., Smithfield township; George W. Feagler, et. al., Richland township; C. Rosenberry, Troy township; A. J. Ballatt et. al., Keyser township.

In matter of public ditch petitioned for by C. Sheets, Richland township, the viewers submit their final report.

Contract awarded to J. J. Van Auken for mapping and transcribing a complete ditch record for the use of the county.

The petition of G. H. K. Moss et. al., for the vacation of an alley in the town of Auburn, is granted and the alley declared vacated.

License to retail liquors granted to the following parties.

Parlee Stimly, Auburn.
Edward Eldridge, Auburn.
Christopher Baker, Auburn Junction.
Wm. Groscop, Auburn,
Richard Till, Waterloo.
J. Wm. Wagner, Garrett.

Permit granted to Elias Zimmerman, guardian, to send his ward Mary J. Watson to the asylum for feeble minded children, at the expense of the county.

The auditor is authorized to rebate taxes for 1879, on certain real estate belonging to the First National Bank of Auburn.

Benjamin L. Williams, of Auburn, appointed constable for Union township, vice Luther J. Hopkins resigned.

The quarterly report of the superintendent of the county Work House, shows five prisoners received, viz: David Worden, Frank White, Uriah S. Daugherty, Jackson Forrest and Wm. Brown, all of whom have been discharged or escaped except the last named. The total cost of maintaining the Work House for the last quarter amounts to $67.00.

Wm. H. Cornell, of Butler township, appointed constable, vice John L. Hall resigned.

The quarterly report of the superintendent of the farm and asylum for the poor shows the following:

—Mack Shaffer, of Ashland, Ohio, is visiting at Mrs. Silberg's.

—J. B. Bittinger, Esq., of Ft. Wayne, was in town Friday and Saturday.

—Charley Garfield, of Bryan, Ohio, is after the swine in this neighborhood.

—Messrs. Bittinger and Wilson have bought the steam mill formerly owned by the Zimmerman Bro's.

—Preparations for the holidays are being made by the churches for the amusement and gratification of the Sabbath-school scholars.

—Mrs. Johnson and daughter, of Ohio, sister of Mr. Jerry Rhodes, are visiting friends in town.

—Tuesday morning, Dec. 2d, between the hours of twelve and one o'clock, Mrs. Soloman Barney was awakened by the breaking open of the kitchen door, and hearing voices in the room, she arose and went to the bed in which Mr. Barney and his son were sleeping and awakened him, telling him that there was some person in the house. She just had time to step around the foot of the bed and behind the screen door, when one of the burglars stepped to the bed-room door and said: "Be quiet for your lives," and immediately comenced firing his revolver into the room, the first shot passing out at the top of the window, and the third breaking a dish on the wash-stand at the head of Mr. Barney's bed. Mr. B. picked up his revolver and returned the fire. The burglar, after exhausting his revolver, stepped back into the parlor to reload, and hearing the click of Mr. B's. revolver, turned and fired two shots and returned to the kitchen to reload, observing to his comrad who stood guard over Mr. Errick, that he would "try it over." Mrs. Barney in the mean time possessing herself with two revolvers that were in the bureau in their apartment, and passing one to Mr. B., she followed him, passed the door leading to the kitchen, discovered the villain inside the door loading his revolver. She took deliberate aim and fired, when the burglar jumped out of the door, exclaiming to his comrad, "come," both successfully making their escape.

In justice to Mr. Errick we explain, that he was without arms to defend himself or to render any assistance, and being guarded by an armed ruffian he chose the wisest plan and remained quiet in his little bed.

The attack was well planned, and must have been arranged either by parties well acquainted with the surroundings, or by a thorough investigation of the premises by the parties themselves. In making their escape a confederate had Dr Emanuel's buggy turned round in the shed, the horses hitched and ready for the emergency, for as soon as the fleeing thieves could reach the barn and mount the carriage they drove out at the top of the speed of the horses, being observed by Mr. J. R. Nichols, who lives on an adjoining property and who was awakened by the noise of the affray. As soon as possible parties were dispatched in all directions, Messrs. Barney and Provines taking the road to Butler, at which point they arrived before daylight. In the darkness they missed the scamps, who drove the team out on a common south of town, where they were found some time after by Mr. Provines, the thieves escaping. So ends one of the most exciting episodes in the history of our little village. The presence of mind displayed by Mrs. Barney and her bravery commands the praise of every one.

Pause, Ponder and Peruse!

The Invention of that Superior and Complete Sewing Machine (The Family Sewing Machine), marks one of the most important eras in the history of machinery, and when we consider its great usefulness and extremely low price ($25), it is very difficult to conceive of any invention for domestic use of more or even equal importance to families. It has great capacity for work; beautiful, smooth, and quiet movement, rapid execution, certainty and delightful ease of operation, that at once commends it above all others The working parts are all steel, strong and durable, and will last a life time; the bobbins hold 100 yards of thread; the stitch is the firmest of all the stitches made, neat and regular, and can be regulated in a moment to sew stitches from an inch in length on coarse material down to the finest, so infintesimal as to be hardly discernable with the naked eye, and with a rapidity rendering it impossible to count them as fast as made; it has more attachments than any other, and it does to perfection all kinds of heavy, coarse, plain, fine, or fancy needle-work with ease, and far less labor than required on other machines. It needs no commendation, the rapid sales, increasing demand and voluntary encomiums from the press, and the thousands of families who use them, amply testify to their undoubted worth as a standard and reliable household necessity, extending its popularity each day. Machines sent anywhere to be examined before any money is paid. Agents wanted by the Company, Address them for information. Family Sewing Machine Co., 755 Broadway, New York. 43-1y.

ANNUAL REPORTS OF THE Departments and Bureaus.

SECRETARY SHERMAN'S REPORT.

The annual report of Hon. John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, of the operations of his department for the fiscal year, is, as usual, a document of considerable volume—too long, by half, for the average newspaper man to think of giving in full to his readers. Following are the principal points of the report:

The ordinary revenues from all sources for the fiscal year ending June 30 were $273,827,184.46. The ordinary expenditures for the same period were $266,947,883.53, leaving a surplus revenue of $6,879,300.93. The amount due to the sinking fund for the year was $36,955,604.63, leaving a deficiency of this amount of $30,076,303.70. After applying the balance of the special 4½-per-cent. United States notes held in the treasury for the redemption of fractional currency, amounting to $8,375,934, to the payment of arrears of pensions, as directed in Sec. 3 of the act approved June 21, 1879, the increased revenue derived during the months of July, August and September of the present year was fully absorbed by current expenses, and the payment of $16,374,240.60 arrears of pensions, accruing under the act approved Jan. 25, 1879. Notwithstanding the unusual demands, the department has been able to purchase and apply to the sinking fund, out of the surplus revenues for the month of October, $10,050,000 6-per-cent. bonds of 1881; and $676,050 in 5-per-cent. bonds issued under the act of March 3, 1864. The latter is the excess of redemption of these bonds, over issues of 4 per cents under the Refunding acts; and unless unexpected appropriations, available for expenditure within this year are made by Congress, the surplus revenues, in addition to paying off the balance of arrears of pensions, will probably enable the department to apply to the sinking-fund account during the year the sum of $34,000,000.

The revenues of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, estimated upon existing laws, will be $288,000,000. The estimates of expenditures for the same period, received from the several Executive Departments, are $278,097,364.39, or an estimated surplus of $9,902,635.61.

Excluding the sinking fund, the estimated expenditures will be $238,269,165.67, showing a surplus of $49,730,861.33. The estimated expenditures are based upon the requirements of existing law and the necessary appropriations for public works in course of construction. The estimated surplus of $9,902,635.61 will probably be exhausted by additional appropriations.

Should Congress increase the appropriations beyond this limit, or repeal or reduce existing taxes, other sources of revenue must be provided. Should this course be determined upon, which, however, the Secretary does not recommend, he would suggest as a means of meeting the deficiency the restoration of a moderate duty on tea and coffee, and the levying of an internal tax upon manufactures of opium, as hereinafter more fully stated. With a view to promote economy, the Secretary ventures to suggest for the consideration of both houses a permanent organization of an appropriations committee for each House, who shall have leave to sit during the recess, with power to send for persons and papers, and to examine all expenditures of the Government; that rules be adopted in the respective houses limiting appropriation bills to items of appropriation, and excluding legislative provisions; that all appropriations, except for the interest of the public debt, be limited to a period not exceeding two years, and that their expenditure be strictly confined to the period of time for which they are appropriated, and that all permanent and indefinite appropriations made more than four years ago, except that for the public debt, be repealed.

"At the date of my annual report, Dec. 2, 1878," says Secretary Sherman, "the preparation for the resumption of specie payments, provided for by the act approved Jan. 19, 1875, had been substantially completed. On the 1st day of January, 1879, the day fixed for the resumption of specie payments, the reserve of coin over and above all matured liabilities was $133,508,804.50. Previous to that time, in view of resumption, United States notes and coin were freely received and paid in private business as equivalents. Actual resumption commenced at the time fixed by law, without any material demand for coin and without disturbance to public or private business.

"The reserve fund created by the Resumption act could not without further legislation be applied to the payment of current appropriations; nor is it to be presumed that Congress will omit to provide ample revenues to meet such appropriations. Therefore, under existing laws, the notes received into the treasury in exchange for coin will always be available for the purchase of or exchange for coin or bullion. Any United States notes in the treasury may be exchanged for coin under the authority of Sec. 3,700 of the Revised Statutes. When notes cannot be used at par for that purpose they must necessarily remain in the treasury. To avoid all uncertainty it is respectfully recommended that by law the resumption fund be specially defined and set apart for the redemption of United States notes, and that the notes redeemed shall only be issued in exchange for or the purchase of coin or bullion.

"The report of the Comptroller of the Currency gives complete statistics relative to the national-banking system from its organization until the present time. The number of banks in operation Oct. 2, of the present year, the date of their last reports, was 2,048, and the aggregate capital, $454,067,365; surplus, $114,786,528; individual deposits, $719,737,569; specie, including United States coin certificates, $42,173,731.23; legal-tender notes, including United States certificates, $93,978,446; as loans, $836,013,107. The total circulation outstanding on Nov. 1 was $337,171,418."

Among the subjects discussed in the report are the relations which have existed between the national banks and the Government in the resumption of specie payments, and in the funding of the public debt. In both of these important financial operations the co-operation of the national banks, the Secretary says, has been of essential service to the Government.

The disbursements for collecting the revenue from customs for expenses incurred within the following fiscal years have been as follows: 1877, $5,603,979.57; 1878, $5,525,587.32; 1879, $5,485,779.03. This shows a reduction for 1878 over 1877 of $78,392.25, and a reduction for 1879 over 1878 of $40,008.29.

A marked improvement has also occurred during the past year in the collection of the revenue from customs. The revenue, under the ad-valorem system, has fallen short of the amount which should have been collected upon a proper assessment of the real foreign market value. This was due to a system of undervaluations in the entries at the custom houses, especially upon goods consigned by foreign manufacturers to agents in the United States.

The total tonnage of vessels of the United States at the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1879, was 2,169,600 tons. It is a grave question of public policy whether the period has not arrived when the unlimited right of purchase, as under the English statutes, should be extended to vessels as well as to other commodities, and when admission to American registry upon the payment of duties should be allowed them upon importations. The recovery of our old position in the carrying trade will more than counterbalance any disadvantage likely to ensue from a modification of restrictions upon the right of purchase, while a moderate duty on ships imported will enable our shipbuilders to compete successfully in the construction of iron vessels of the largest class.

WAR DEPARTMENT.

Hon. George W. McCrary, Secretary of War, in his annual report, says that the actual expenditures of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, were $42,622,723.63. The appropriations available for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, aggregated $45,076,702.95; those for 1879 were $38,016,030.95, and those for the current fiscal year amounted to $40,269,821.01. The estimates for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, are $40,380,428.93, to which amount they have been reduced from $44,308,048.14.

The estimates for public works, as reduced, are $7,357,084.42, which amount is $326,047.34 less than the estimates for 1879, $115,946.88 less than those for 1880, and $3,437,409.19 less than the appropriations for 1880, which were $10,794,491.61. The views expressed under this head in the last annual report are renewed as best explanatory to the reduction of those estimates, which aggregated $20,162,875.42. About seventeen-twentieths of this amount are for the "continuation of works once commenced under legal authority, and remaining unfinished for want of funds."

The Secretary joins in the recommendation of Gen. Sherman that the army be increased to 25,000 men, exclusive of detachments. He says it is undeniable that most if not all the disasters attending Indian hostilities are the result of inadequacy of force on our part. The records of the War Department show that since the close of the war of the Rebellion fifty-five officers of the army have been killed in Indian warfare, and a corresponding number wounded, beside a proportionate number of men killed and wounded. Among the list of killed will be found such valuable officers as Canby, Custer, and Thornburgh.

The Secretary concurs in Gen. Sherman's recommendation regarding the sale of abandoned military forts and reservations.

The following extracts from the Secretary's report will be found of interest:

"The Judge Advocate General reports the convictions for desertion from the army as increased, during the past year, by twenty-four, and expresses the opinion that the two principal, or most conspicuous, causes of desertion in the army are: 1. Drunkenness, or rather indulgence in intoxicating liquors; 2. Oppressive or injudicious treatment of soldiers by non-commissioned officers, and especially the First Sergeants of companies invested with an excess of authority.

"New military posts have been under construction on the Yellowstone or Milk river, near the northern boundary line, on the line of communication of the renegade Indians who fled into British America; on Lake Chelan, in Northern Washington Territory, and on the north fork of the Canadian river, in the Indian Territory; also on Bear Butte creek, in the Black Hills, Dakota. Other military posts were authorized by law at El Paso, Texas, at Pagosa Springs, Col., and on the Niobrara river, in Nebraska.

"The military cemeteries, eight in number, are in good order, and improve in beauty as cultivation improves. It is suggested by the Quartermaster General that Arlington Cemetery affords ample space, without encroaching on the ground occupied by the soldiers of the war, to be used as a national Government cemetery for the interment of members of Congress and officers of all services of the United States who may die at the capital or whose friends may desire for them such a place of sepulture.

"The work of marking the graves in military cemeteries with marble and granite head-stones is practically completed. Contracts have been let for placing marble head-stones on the graves of soldiers who died during the war, and were buried in private village and city cemeteries, and whose friends have not been able to do this honor to their memory. The work can hardly be begun before next spring."

The history of the Eads jetties work at the mouth of the Mississippi river is given at length, and the Secretary states that the Attorney General has been requested to render an opinion on several questions as to the proper construction of certain provisions of the law materially bearing upon the claim of Maj. Eads for payment.

The Secretary, in referring to the Ute outbreak, takes the ground that the Government should insist in its demands for the surrender and punishment of the Indians responsible for the Meeker massacre and the treacherous attack upon Maj. Thornburgh's command.

THE NAVY.

Hon. Richard W. Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, reports to Congress that there are now eighty vessels of the navy in good condition for action in case of need, and that there are also twenty tugs that in an emergency might be made equal to some of the vessels included in the eighty for purposes of war. He estimates the navy practically to consist of ninety-two vessels. Mr. Thompson refutes the idea that the navy is not at present in good condition, and says it is in possession of ample material for all our requirements. The natural wear and tear of material, however, makes him anxious to make a small addition to the navy, and for that reason he asks Congress to give $3,000,000 for the construction of new vessels. He estimates that this sum, if given him, will build about six vessels upon models proposed by him. He has built no new vessels since his time as Secretary in the proper sense of the word, for he held that under the law money appropriated for the repair of vessels could not be used for the simple construction of new vessels.

Secretary Thompson has been experimenting with a process for preserving wood used in the construction of vessels. He began his experiments when he first went into the position of Secretary, but has had no opportunity of testing practically the results of any of his experiments. The only place where he could properly use wood so treated would be in the construction of an entirely new ship. In one of his experiments with his process he treated a portion of a bit of wood and then submerged it in water for nine months. At the end of that time the submerged bit was taken out, and it was found that the part treated was as good as ever, while the other part was thoroughly honeycombed.

Mr. Thompson thinks that it has been a wise policy on the part of the country to let the question of building ships of war lie in statu quo for a time. England has been making, during the last few years, very costly experiments in determining the best class of vessels to be built, and this country can now reap the results of them without any experiments. It would be possible to have the American Government, at a comparatively little expense, build up a very powerful navy. The Secretary believes that the day of iron vessels has already come; that they are practically doomed. There is no iron plate that can be manufactured for which a ball cannot be found to pierce it, and an iron vessel once pierced will go down with almost no warning. An aperture cut in an iron vessel cannot be stopped up, as in the case of wooden vessels. He believes that the navies of the earth will have to return to wooden vessels, and rely upon speed, superior armament, and skillful seamanship for success.

The Secretary of the Navy refers with pride to the fact that at the end of the fiscal year he will have $1,500,000 to cover into the treasury of unexpended appropriations made for his department. He asks for the department proper $300,000 more than was given him by the last Congress. He says that under the law naval officers are, of course, allowed so much pay, and all that a person would need would be the rank of officers and their number to find out exactly how much money is required. He figured that out for the last Congress, but they cut it down $100,000. He asks $100,000 of Congress to make up the deficiency of last year, $100,000 for this year, and the third $100,000 is for the increase in pay that has come from natural causes.

The Secretary asks Congress to give $90,000 for the continuance of his naval schools. Upon this subject the Secretary is enthusiastic. He says he never intends to pause until he has the entire American navy manned by American sailors. When he began his system of training-ships he said there was hardly a sailor in the navy that was a native born; they all represented the scum of foreign ports, and it was seldom any of these sailors who were enlisted ever became naturalized citizens. The results that have thus far been obtained by his school are most flattering.

Mr. Thompson does not think the time has yet come for free ships. He thinks that the present laws should remain, for in them he thinks shipbuilding can only be maintained in this country. He wants this country to do like England—build all vessels required for its own navy. He makes some recommendations in relation to the navy; asks for some means to keep in good condition all navy-yards; and suggests that certain money be allowed for the repair and reconstruction of the yard at Pensacola, which was destroyed during the war.

THE TREASURY.

The report of the Hon. James G. Gilfillan, Treasurer of the United States, shows that the total net revenue for the fiscal year 1879 was $273,827,184. The total net expenditures for 1879 were $266,947,883, leaving a net increase of funds of $6,879,300. There were received from customs sources $137,250,047; from internal revenue, $113,561,610; from lands, $924,781; and from miscellaneous sources, $22,090,748. A comparison of the receipts from all sources for the fiscal years 1879 and 1878 shows the following result: There was a decrease in 1879 of the revenue from lands of $154,962. From all other sources there was a marked increase. The increase of 1879 over 1878 from customs was $7,078,307; from internal revenue, $2,979,963; and from miscellaneous sources, $6,158,914. The total net increase of revenue in 1879 over 1878 was $16,088,303. On the other hand, there was an increase in the net expenditures in 1879 over 1878 of $29,983,588. Of this increase, $2,887,074 is attributable to the interest on the public debt. The remainder of the increase arises from the civil miscellaneous list in the different departments.

The operations in bonds, during the fiscal year 1879, were very large. There was issued, in bonds or securities, gold certificates, refunding certificates, and United States notes, $792,807,043. There was re-issued, from the same sources, $692,445,800—making a net excess of issues over redemptions of $93,361,533.

The receipts proper at the principal treasury offices of the United States were as follows:

Treasury, Washington, D. C.	$136,189,584
Sub-treasury, Baltimore, Md.	9,387,199
Sub-treasury, New York	177,881,368
Sub-treasury, Philadelphia, Pa.	25,229,968
Sub-treasury, Boston, Mass.	26,309,508
Sub-treasury, Cincinnati, Ohio	5,601,502
Sub-treasury, Chicago, Ill.	10,169,370
Sub-treasury, St. Louis, Mo.	3,779,311
Sub-treasury, New Orleans, La.	3,708,818
Sub-treasury, San Francisco, Cal.	37,394,358

The following table shows the operations of national banks during the last fiscal year:

Number of national banks organized, failed, in voluntary liquidation and reducing circulation, to June 30, 1879.

The number of national banks which had deposited securities for their circulation to June 30, 1878, was	2,389
The number organized during the fiscal year 1879 was	38
Total number of banks organized to June 30, 1879	2,427
The number that failed prior to July 1, 1878, was	70
The number that failed during the fiscal year 1879 was	11
Total to June 30, 1879	81
In voluntary liquidation prior to July 1, 1878	244
Went into voluntary liquidation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879	36
Total	280
Liquidating banks that failed during the fiscal year 1879	4
Actual number in voluntary liquidation June 30, 1879	276
Number of banks doing business June 30, 1879	2,070
Total	2,427

The United States treasury held in trust for national banks, on June 30, 1879, as securities for circulations and public deposits, a total of $369,006,000 in United States, Pacific railway, and personal bonds.

The total amount of United States currency of all issues outstanding at the close of the fiscal year was $362,946,831. The redemptions of United States currency, and of notes of failed, liquidating, and reducing national banks for the last fiscal year amounted to $81,348,830. During the fiscal year the total amount of United States bonds retired by purchase, conversion, and redemption was $452,595,550.

GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

Gen. Sherman's annual report to the Secretary of War is prefaced with the usual tabular statements and returns compiled by the Adjutant General, commenting on which Gen. Sherman says:

"The eleven Generals, 1,559 officers, 20,566 men and 233 Indian scouts, together with such officers of staff as are assigned by the War Department to duty with troops, constitute the army proper, or the 'combative force.' All other parts of the military establishment are provided by law for special service, more less connected with the army or militia, but are not available for frontier defenses. Thus, for instance, the 397 enlisted men of ordnance are in fact the workmen at the arsenals; the 192 men of the engineer corps are at Willet's point undergoing instruction in torpedo practice, and are not subject to the division commander; the 456 men of the signal corps are employed in observing the weather, or in working telegraphs; the 114 ordnance sergeants have charge of old forts or fixed magazines; the 151 commissary sergeants are in charge of stores; 187 men are stewards of hospitals. The West Point detachment, 186 in number, is localized at the Military Academy; the prison guard at Fort Leavenworth comprises 70 men, and recruiting detachments absorb 1,707 men at Davis island, Columbus, Ohio, and Jefferson Barracks, Mo. These various detachments, aggregating 3,463 enlisted men of the highest grades, compose about one-sixth part of the enlisted men provided by law for the whole army, leaving but 20,799 for actual service. I mention these figures in some detail, because I know that it is the popular belief, shared by many members of Congress, that we have 25,000 men on duty. I have done all in my power to reduce these detachments to the lowest number possible so as to afford more men to our skeleton companies, but have found it impossible, an I notice that similar detachments are reported on all army returns for fifty years back. There are 430 companies in the regular army; 25,000 men would give fifty-eight to each, which is as small as any company should be, and I earnestly recommend that you ask Congress to so legislate that the 25,000 men provided by law may be allowed exclusively for requirements of the line, and that special provision be made for these several detachments, as has already been done for the signal service. The army cannot, with justice, be held responsible for the work of 25,000, when so large a fraction is necessarily diverted to other uses, perhaps of equal national importance."

The tables above referred to show that the grand aggregate of the army roll is 2,187 officers and 24,367 men in the service, and 388 officers retired.

Gen. Sherman devotes a large portion of his report to the Ute troubles. He introduces the subject with a history of the tribe. These Indians, he says, are of the worst class, and occupy the roughest part of our country for farming, grazing, or for military operations. Their management is complicated by the fact that their country is known to possess mineral deposits, which attracts a bold and adventurous class of white men. They are very warlike, and have no difficulty in procuring, in exchange for their deer-skins, horses, and sheep any amount of the best rifles and ammunition. As long as the game lasts they will not work or attempt farming, except in the smallest and most ridiculous way, and that only by compulsion.

Gen. Sherman refers at some length to last summer's incursions of Indians from Sitting Bull's camp, and kindred subjects, and remarks that some more permanent security must be found than results from the good-will of our neighbors. He, therefore, recommends that Congress be asked to appropriate $100,000 to complete Fort Assinniboine, and $200,000 to build a new post near Wood mountain.

Gen. Sherman reports a highly satisfactory condition of affairs in the Department of Texas, especially along the Rio Grande frontier.

The report in conclusion treats of the subject of military education, and, after referring to the artillery school at Fortress Monroe and academy at West Point, says: "Similar schools should be established and maintained for cavalry and infantry. These have repeatedly been attempted at Forts Leavenworth and Snelling, but no sooner have they been begun than some Indian outbreak has imperatively called away the troops so that at this time we have nothing of the kind. But the day must come when schools for infantry and cavalry will be established in the nature of a post-graduate course, and if possible for instruction in the use of the rifle and horse before your officers and recruits are pushed into battle and danger."

ARMY REPORTS.

Maj. Gen. W. S. Hancock, commanding the military Division of the Atlantic, in his annual report, among other recommendations, asks attention to a suggestion of a Maj. Arnold as to the propriety of the passage of a law retiring those ordnance sergeants of the army who have received such a privilege by years of continuous meritorious service. He concurs in this, and also in the recommendation of the Inspector General of the division, that such a law should apply to all old and deserving sergeants in the army line and staff. A sea-wall around Governor's Island is earnestly advocated.

Maj. Gen. McDowell's report of the military operations in the Division of the Pacific is a long and interesting document. He gives a detailed statement of the operations in the several detachments of that division. He urges an early survey of the new reservation on the Salinas for those interesting Indians, the Pimas, Maricopas and Papagos. He asks the attention of the War Department to the imperfect armament of the sea-coast defenses in his division, the guns being old style, and not sufficient in number or condition. He devotes much space to the subject of rifle practice. The improvement in marksmanship has been very decided.

Maj. Gen. Schofield, Superintendent and Commandant at West Point, in his annual report says that the instruction in the several departments of the West Point Academy during the past year has been fully up to the previous high standard of the institution, and the progress of the several classes satisfactory. It is gradually yielding to the more enlightened and refined sentiments which govern the relations between young men of the present day. The change introduced two years ago by the restoration of instruction in the English language in the first year's course has proved beneficial. It is requisite that young officers should be given reasonable facilities and encouragement in all arms of the service, and to continue their professional studies in connection with the practical application of military principles. Without such opportunities little further progress is generally made after leaving the academy, and much that has been learned is soon lost. Such opportunities are now presented for a post-graduate course of studies to the young officers who are detailed as instructors at West Point, and to those who enjoy the benefits of the artillery school at Fortress Monroe. The apportionment of cadetships among the States and Territories, he thinks, is so just a feature that it cannot be sacrificed for the purpose of securing a higher standard of admission. Yet there seems to be no reason why, if there are any candidates who possess much higher qualifications than the standard requires, they may not be given the full benefit of their superior attainments by being admitted to a higher class in the academy. He suggests, for the consideration of Congress, that the facilities offered by the Military Academy might, at slight additional cost, be made available for the education of a considerable number of young men in excess of the annual vacancies in the army, to be returned to their respective States for service in the organized militia.

Brig. Gen. Pope, who commands the Department of the Platte, in speaking of the Utes, says it is no longer possible to leave them where they are without constant collision and outrage on the part of both whites and Indians. All military efforts of the Government to arrest the movement of immigrants to the great Ute reservation must be both futile and prejudicial to both the General Government and the State of Colorado. The time has come when the safety of both whites and Utes demands some change of location for these Indians. He recommends the consolidation of the Utes on the headwaters of the west fork of the Charna and along the valley of the Navajo. He condemns the new reservation selected by the commission sent out last year as being open to all objections to be urged against the present one.

Gen. E. O. Ord, who commands the military Department of Texas, states that all the Indians who have penetrated that country have been so hotly pursued by troops as to prevent their doing much damage. There have been only three murders by marauders during the year. Last year there were seventeen in the region referred to. Good order in Mexico and the cessation of raids from that country have enabled a considerable portion of the troops held in reserve to carry out the order of the President dated Jan. 1, 1877, to cross the border in pursuit of raiders, to be diverted for use in exploring our own wild country, and occupying water-holes frequented by raiding bands from our own Indian reservations. An appropriation of $200,000 for four additional posts needed to replace those vacated is very earnestly recommended for the accommodation of eleven counties now unprovided for.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The report of Carl Schurz, Secretary of the Interior Department, is a document of considerable length. A large portion is devoted to the discussion of the Indian question, a subject that is attracting a good deal of attention just now. The Secretary says:

Whatever troubles and perplexities the presence of Indians among us may cause, every man who loves justice and who values the honor of the American name will admit it is our solemn duty to leave nothing untried to prepare a better fate than extermination, a better rule than that of brute force, for the original occupants of the soil upon which so many millions of our people have grown prosperous and happy. That all the Indians on this Northern continent have been savages, and that many of them are savages now, is true; but it is also true that many tribes have risen to a promising degree of civilization, and there is no reason to doubt that the rest, if wisely guided, will be found capable of following their example. Of the 252,000 Indians in the United States there have been, since the pacification of the Sioux, at no time more than 300 in hostile conflict with the whites. Neither does it appear that such partial disturbances have been provoked by the absence, or prevented by the presence, of military force. Of the four disturbances that have occurred within the last two years, three broke out in the immediate presence of such military force, and only one without it. At this moment a band of less than 800 Utes and another of about 150 Indian marauders in New Mexico—in all less than 1,000 of an Indian population of a quarter of a million—are causing serious trouble. In fact, the number of white desperadoes who were, within the past twelve months, banded together in New Mexico for murder and rapine was larger than that of the Indians recently on the war-path near the southern part of the Territory. While I am by no means disposed to belittle the deplorable nature of the Indian disturbances, or the great value of the military force in suppressing them, it is but just to the Indians to point out the important fact that disturbance and hostility is the exception and peaceable conduct the rule; that a very large majority of the Indian reservations are in a condition of uninterrupted quiet, without the presence of a coercing force, and the equally significant experience that the more civilized an Indian becomes the more certainly can his peaceable and orderly conduct be depended upon.

The Secretary says the ends steadily pursued by the department are the following:

First—To set the Indians to work as agriculturists or herders, thus to break up their habits of savage life, and to make them self-supporting.

Second—To educate their youth of both sexes, so as to introduce to the growing generation civilized ideas, wants and aspirations.

Third—To allot parcels of land to Indians in severalty, and to give them an individual title to their farms in fee inalienable for a certain period, thus to foster the pride of individual ownership of property, instead of the former dependence upon the tribe with its territory held in common.

Fourth—When the settlement in severalty with individual title is accomplished, to dispose with their consent of those lands of their reservations which are not settled and used by them, the proceeds to form a fund for their benefit, which will gradually relieve the Government of the expenses at present provided for by annual appropriations.

Fifth—When this is accomplished, to treat the Indians like other inhabitants of the United States under the laws of the land.

This policy, if adopted and supported by Congress and carried out with wisdom and firmness, will, in my opinion, gradually bring about the solution of the Indian problem without injustice to the Indian, and also without obstructing the development of the country. It will raise them to a level of civilization at least equal to that of the civilized tribes in the Indian Territory, and probably higher. It will not take away from them by force what in justice belongs to them, but induce them to part with what they cannot cultivate and use themselves for a fair compensation. It will open to progress and improvement large districts now held by the Indians which will then be of no real advantage to them, and are now to nobody else.

Referring to the assertions frequently made that the tribal relation must be broken up and the reservation system must be abandoned, Secretary Schurz observes: An attempt to establish three objects at once all over the country, without intermediate stages, by military force, would, undoubtedly, result in many cases in Indian wars of unprecedented magnitude and bitterness which would require a much larger army than we at present possess, and prove in the end not only the most inhuman, but in blood and treasure the most inhuman of all wars.

The Secretary says the cause of the trouble cannot be found in any just complaint on the part of the Utes. It is expected that the occurrence of this trouble and the transactions following thereupon will result in such arrangements as will be calculated to prevent for the future hostile contact between white inhabitants and the Indians in that part of the country.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The report of Hon. Green B. Raum, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, is very voluminous, and contains a large number of tabulated statements. The following synopsis embraces the most interesting portion of the document. Mr. Raum predicts that the receipts from internal-revenue taxes will during the present fiscal year reach $115,000,000. During the last three years 3,117 illicit distilleries have been seized. In order to provide ample force to suppress illicit distilling, Gen. Raum recommends an appropriation of $100,000 as a deficiency to be used during the present fiscal year.

During the year ended June 30, 1879, $113,449,621 internal-revenue taxes were collected and paid into the treasury.

The receipts from distilled spirits for the year 1879, as compared with 1878, show an increase of $1,140,978. As compared with 1878, the increased production of spirits during the fiscal year 1879 was 15,789,568 gallons.

The increase of production of manufactured tobacco the last fiscal year was 12,026,821 pounds; of the number of cigars and cigarettes, 194,177,719.

During the year, 6,363 persons have been arrested for illicit distilling, and twenty-seven officers and employes killed and forty-eight wounded while engaged in the effort to collect the tax and enforce the internal-revenue laws.

The quantity of spirits (71,832,631 gallons) produced and deposited in the distillery warehouses during the fiscal year was greater than the quantity produced during any other year. The closest approximation to this product was that of the year ended June 30, 1870, which was 71,337,000 gallons. The production of the fiscal year 1870 was obviously excessive, as it fell to 54,776,546 gallons in 1871, and it might be apprehended that the product of the year would fall below that of 1879, but when it is considered that 14,837,581 gallons of spirits were exported during the year 1879, and that the foreign demand is unabated, it seems probable that the large product of the early portion of this year will be continued during the year.

Regarding the production and movement of distilled spirits during the first four months of the present fiscal year, the report says: "It shows that the foreign demand of last year is steadily maintained, while the production is 2,794,148 gallons greater than the corresponding period last year, and the withdrawal 2,958,950 gallons greater than for the same period last year. If the business of these four months is maintained during the balance of the fiscal year, which is scarcely to be credited, the production will be over 82,000,000 gallons, and the amount of tax received will be over $45,750,000."

There were during the year 5,448 distilleries registered, and 5,347 operated. During the special tax for the year ended April 30, 1879, there were 49,464,421 proof gallons of spirits rectified. The quantity of spirits—19,212,470 gallons—actually remaining in warehouses June 30, 1879, is the quantity as shown by the original gauge of each package. The quantity of spirits withdrawn from the distillery warehouses for export during the year was 14,837,731 gallons.

During the four months of the present fiscal year the decrease in receipts from tobacco and snuff as compared with the corresponding period last year was $2,336,599. These figures indicate a reduction for the year in receipts from this source of over $7,000,000.

The total amount of collections from tobacco in all its forms, including internal-revenue tax on imported tobacco, snuff and cigars, and special taxes paid by manufacturers of, and dealers in, leaf and manufactured tobacco for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1879, was $40,135,002. As compared with the total receipts from the same source for the preceding fiscal year, this shows an increase of $43,247.

The total cost of collecting the revenue for the year was $4,206,830—being 3 7-10 per cent. upon the amount collected.

During the past three fiscal years $343,099,000 internal-revenue taxes were collected and paid into the treasury. The average cost of collecting, including salaries and expenses of the Internal Revenue Bureau, was 3¾ per cent.

The total amount realized from the tax on capital and deposits of banks and bankers during the fiscal year ended June 30 was $3,490,913, and for the fiscal year of 1879 $3,184,979, a decrease of $305,943. A statement of the capital and deposits of savings banks and bankers other than national banks shows an aggregate of $196,290,513 invested in Government bonds, against $158,882,830 reported last year.

The total value of property seized during the year for violations of the internal-revenue laws was $524,146; total number of suits pending July 1, 1879, for violation of the internal-revenue laws, 11,924. During the year 4,501 suits have been settled, decided, or dismissed, and the amount recovered by the Government on judgments and from compromises accepted has been $892,548. The total value of internal-revenue stamps issued during the year was $129,655,535.

A full statement is given of the estimated expenses of each district, making up a grand aggregate. In addition to the bureau proper, there are connected with the various districts throughout the United States 126 Collectors, 860 Deputy Collectors, 179 clerks, messengers and janitors, 695 gaugers, 1,308 storekeepers, and 50 tobacco inspectors.

POSTOFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The Postmaster General, in his annual report, renews the recommendation contained in his last report for the enactment of a law readjusting the compensation of railroads for carrying mail upon a basis of space, speed, and frequency, supplemented by the weight of the mails carried. The railroad companies have, as a general thing, neglected to furnish statistics of receipts, expenditures, etc., as requested. The recommendation is made that the appropriation to enable the Postmaster General to obtain the proper facilities for the prompt transmission of mails by rail be increased this year to $400,000.

The cost of railway service on the 30th of June, 1879, was at the rate of $9,692,590 per annum, an increase over the cost of the service during the preceding year of $125,905. This increase does not, however, represent the actual rate of increase in the service, as account must be taken of a reduction of 5 per cent. in the rate of compensation from July 1, 1878, made under the act of June 17, 1878. The amount of this deduction is, in round numbers, $400,000, making, with the $125,905, an increase of $525,905 for 1879 over 1878, being little less than 5.5 per cent. The general increase of business all over the country, and the reasonable certainty that the present prosperity will continue for some years, will require the appropriation for the railway service for the next fiscal year to be increased to at least $10,000,000, and the estimate is accordingly placed at that sum.

The estimate for the railway postoffice car service for 1881 is placed at $1,350,000. The Postmaster General earnestly renews the recommendation of last year for a reclassification of the employes of the railway mail service by the General Superintendent of that service.

Gen. Key reports that the operation of the present laws regulating the increase of compensation for increased speed and increased frequency of service upon "star routes" (i. e., all those whereon the mails are transported by horses and ordinary vehicles), results in great loss to the Government, and recommends legislation to enable him to retrench in this direction.

The estimates for "star" service the next fiscal year contemplate the continuance of the present efficient service in other States, and largely-increased mail facilities in the States of Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, South Carolina, North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi and Alabama. The total amount asked for "star" service the next fiscal year is $7,975,000. The estimates for inland mail service by steamboats is $900,000.

In regard to the use of mails by lottery companies, the Postmaster General suggests that Secs. 3,929 and 4,041, Revised Statutes, be amended by striking out the word "fraudulent" preceding the word "lottery," in each section, which will make the legislation more harmonious and effective. It would aid the department in the execution of the intent of the law if the provision of Sec. 3,930 requiring the return to the writers of registered letters addressed to such schemes were in terms extended to include all letters so addressed.

The report recommends that the provision of Sec. 17 of the act of March 3, 1879, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury and Postmaster General to adopt regulations for delivery to addresses in the United States of dutiable books, with the collection of customs duties thereon, be extended to embrace all articles of dutiable matter received in the mails from foreign countries.

The Postmaster General recommends legislation to enable the Department to adopt a general regulation of the Postal Union relative to the payment of limited indemnity for registered articles lost or destroyed in the postal service.

The report goes on to say that the increasing demands of the postal service call for a large increase in the appropriation for the payment of clerks in the postoffices. The estimate, $3,650,000, for this item is greatly below the actual need for the service.

The free-delivery service is mentioned as having attained great success.

The other recommendations of interest made are, in brief, that Congress shall provide at the next session for superseding at the earliest possible date the mail-locks now in use by others of new and improved patterns (for which purpose an estimate of $150,000 is submitted); that the Public Printer be authorized to print a new edition of the codified postal laws and regulations, to be sold to the public at cost; that authority be given to the Department to contract for the publication of a monthly postal guide for a term of five years.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

The annual report of the General Land Office shows that, during the fiscal year ending June 30 last, 9,323,353 acres of public lands were disposed of, and 9,484,996 acres were surveyed in addition to the 734,561,236 acres previously surveyed. The total number of acres of public domain still unsurveyed is about 1,081,000,000. The disposals were mainly as follows: Homestead entries, 5,260,111 acres; timber-culture entries 2,766,574 acres; cash entries, 622,574 acres (including 166,996 acres entered under Desert Land law); grants to railroads, 278,334 acres; swamp lands patented to States, 75,383 acres; other grants to States, 186,394 acres. The amount of lands surveyed the last fiscal year exceeds by 414,769 acres the total acres surveyed in the preceding twelve months, and while the report shows a falling off of some 773,000 acres in cash sales, the State selections, scrip locations and lands patented for railroad grants, the increase in the area taken up by settlers under the Homestead and Timber Culture laws has been sufficient not only to counterbalance this falling off, but to make the aggregate disposals for the year greater by 647,204 acres than the total for the previous year. The increase in homestead entries was 841,795 acres; and in timber-culture entries 396,139 acres. Owing to the existing laws for the disposal of public lands for homestead and timber culture it is shown that during the last fiscal year, with a large disposal of land, there was received from all sources $1,383,113, less by $189,418 than the amount received during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878.

The Acting Commissioner reports that under the various acts of the Forty-fifth Congress, and with the aid of the appropriation of $40,000 granted last March for the protection of timber and the public lands, efforts have been continued to suppress depredations, but they are yet extensive, and the interests of the Government and those of the people now residing, or who may desire to settle, in the region of public timbered lands, require that they should be still pursued with unremitting earnestness and vigor. In Arkansas alone the annual loss to the Government by the destruction of valuable timber is estimated at not less than $500,000. A large amount of lumber has been recovered, and considerable sums of money received as compromises on suits brought by the Government against timber depredators, and many other suits are still pending.

In Michigan and elsewhere along the northern national boundary line extensive depredations are reported to have been committed upon our public timber lands by Canadians.

MISCELLANEOUS REPORTS.

The Secret Service.

The report of Chief Brooks, of the Secret Service Department, to the Solicitor of the Treasury for the year ending June 30, embraces the following statistics: Arrests, 539, of whom 279 were charged with passing counterfeit money and 35 with dealing in it, and all the others, except 27, having something to do with an unwarranted inflation of the currency of the country. The aggregate sentences of those imprisoned was 430 years 8 months and 4 days, and the total amount of fines assessed was $41,485. The following table shows the amount and character of the counterfeit money captured:

United States treasury notes	$23,449
National-bank notes	5,025
Fractional currency	93,565
Coin	349,285
Nickels	8,294
State-bank notes	436
Genuine raised notes	210
Total	$3,385,144

Dead Letters.

The report of Mr. E. J. Dallas, Chief of the Dead Letter Office of the Postoffice Department, shows that there were received during the last fiscal year an aggregate of 2,906,513 dead letters, a decrease of 190,292 from the number received during the previous year. This decrease is believed to be owing to the general use of envelopes on which requests to "return if not called for," etc., are printed. The extent to which these "request envelopes" are used was ascertained by a test made in May last. In a single day there were mailed at the postoffices in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore 354,696 letters, of which number 193,879 bore the request to "return in ten days if not called for." Of the aggregate number of letters received at the Dead Letter Office, 16,007 contained money to the value of $31,591; 13,575 contained drafts, checks, etc., to the value of $1,105,762; 47,797 contained postage stamps of the value of $2,387, and 24,373 contained other papers representing a monetary value; 24,024 letters contained photographs, and 28,306 contained articles of all descriptions, from a bottle of perfumery to a Limburger cheese.

Commissary General's Report.

The Commissary General of the United States army, in his annual report to the Secretary of War, shows that the total amount disbursed for subsistence stores during the fiscal year ending June 30 last was $3,003,473, of which $791,611 was reimbursed by sales of stores to officers and enlisted men; $125,096 was collected for tobacco sold to enlisted men, and balance (except a few inconsiderable amounts from miscellaneous sources) was furnished to the department by Congressional appropriations. From tables accompanying the report it appears that the cost to the department of all subsistence supplies has been constantly diminishing since 1877, notably in meat and flour, component of rations.

"ONE WOMAN'S LOVE."

BY [illegible] LA MOILLE.

It is a summer evening,
And, as the sunlight dies,
So fades my Lady Love,
As on her couch [illegible]
With weeping friends around her,
And death-mists dim her eyes.

Beside her sits a poet;
He clasps her clasping hands;
Her smiles make bright his verses,
And through all noble lands
His love wins fame and honor
By beauty's sweet demands.

He whispers now a message
Of love, and faith, and trust;
He passionately kisses
Her lips of chilling dust.
There is a sudden tumult—
A stranger enters, just

When vanishes the sunlight;
And now my Lady sleeps,
At last, in dreamless slumber;
Another mourner weeps.
Out speaks the grieving poet,
"And who is this who keeps

"His woe concealed so closely,
Until it is too late?"
Outspeaks the scowling stranger,
"I reached the city gate
Just now, and found long journey
Brought me, indeed, too late.

"I knew this winsome Lady
A year ago in Spain;
She gave her solemn promise,
When summer came again,
That we should be united
By love's ungalling chain!"

The poet's eyes are flashing,
And, with a choking cry,
He says, "Who doubts my Lady?
Who says that she could sigh
To me and to another?—
I fling to him the lie!"

The stranger, coolly saying,
"Look in that locket! I"—
The poet cries, "That picture
Is mine!" The spring they try—
And lo! the priest who shrived her
On her true heart doth lie.

CHICAGO, Ill.

SHIFTING.

BY HARRIET E. S. CRESSY.

"I must have my pay right off, so you may as well stir around and get it, or there'll be a fuss!" said the haughty Mr. Starbuck to a poor man who owed him a small sum of money.

"Well," replied the humble fellow, whom we will call Jack Styles, "I will pay you next week without fail. Peter Fanley is owing me enough to pay it, and he is coming over to Butcher Johnson's next Tuesday with a beef critter, and he will then pay me, and I will hand it over to you."

"Mind you do, or you'll be sent up for a month or two!" was the reply.

This threat seemed hard and uncalled for, as Jack always paid his debts whenever he could; but he had been very unfortunate all through the hard, long winter, and now needed a little time to pay the debts that had accumulated. He had been very ill with rheumatism for a month or two; beside, his wife and two children had been sick with fevers, and his doctor's bill had amounted to more than he had earned; for when he could work his help had been needed at home, and work had been scarce, and it was with difficulty he had found anything to do when he was able to do it. Old Starbuck knew all this; and knew also that Jack was an honest fellow; but he always was very hard with the poor and unfortunate.

Jack took the cruel threat very much to heart, and fretted himself nearly into a fever for two or three days. What if Fanley should disappoint him, after all? It hardly seemed possible he would, for the butcher had the promise of the cow for the following Tuesday; but Fanley lived some eight miles away, and something might happen that he would not come with her. Oh, he hoped there would not; for he had a great horror of a jail, and had never been threatened like that before.

Thank God, men are not now imprisoned for debt in the State where Jack then lived; but such was the law at that time; and many a poor man, though honest, was thrust into prison, and his family left in want, for the reason that he could not pay his debts. What possible good such a law could do we have never been able to see, as it only filled up the jails, made expense for the State, and deprived the family of the help they needed, beside placing the culprit in a condition to earn nothing to relieve himself of the debt for which he was imprisoned. Perhaps it prevented some from running into debt as much as they otherwise would; in this respect it might have done some good.

Well, Tuesday came and Jack kept a good lookout for Fanley and his cow, who, in going to the butcher's, would have to pass his house. About 11 o'clock of that forenoon a boy came running to his house to inform him that both man and cow were on the way thither, but the latter had fallen into the snow, and he was a little afraid she was dead. Jack sprung and ran with all his might to the place where the cow was lying, which was a half mile from his house; and there, to his utter despair, the creature was sprawled on the snow, stone dead.

"What could have been the matter with her?" asked Jack, greatly excited.

"Don't know, I'm sure, 'less 'tis she's worrit to death tramping in the snow."

Jack looked at the bloated animal and surmised that something more than fatigue had caused the dissolution. But a sled and yoke of oxen were procured and the carcass drawn to Butcher Johnson, who, after making a post-mortem examination, found that the deceased came to her death from dropsy, unlike fatigue from tramping in the snow hastening the event. Of course he could not purchase the carcass of a diseased animal, so it was turned over to the scavengers of the field.

Fanley was grieved at the loss, for he was a poor man, and Jack, who was told by Fanley that he could not pay him at present, was frantic.

"To jail, then, I must go," he tearfully exclaimed. "There is no use in trying to put off old Starbuck any longer. I would not dare face him with the old promise in my mouth; no, to jail I must go."

That afternoon he went to see Starbuck, who said to him, as soon as he saw him, "You've come, then, to pay me the money?"

Jack hung his head and meekly replied, "No, Mr. Starbuck, the cow died."

"None of your stories; if you have not got the money you will have a home over there a little while," he said, pointing to the jail.

"I could not get it."

"'Nuff sed, then; here, walk over to Sheriff Patton's with me," taking the poor man by the collar and walking along.

Starbuck, who was a hard drinker, was pretty drunk, and he went along at an uneven gait, still hold of Jack's collar. Meeting the Sheriff after going a short distance, he handed Jack over to him and returned home.

"Have you been sending Jack Styles off to prison?" asked Starbuck's wife as he entered the house.

"Yes, and I'm going to send every other scamp that won't pay me to the same place. I have got to raise some money to pay off this mortgage, or I shall be turned out of house and home, and you, too," he replied.

"Well, this man looks like an honest kind of fellow. How much does he owe you?"

"Twenty dollars, or so."

"Not enough to pay your liquor bill one week," thought his wife; but she said nothing, as she dreaded to arouse his temper, which might, when fully under way, be compared to a hurricane or any other dangerous element. That afternoon she sent a boy with a large basket full of eatables to Jack's family, for she had heard they were very poor, and continued so to do every week while Jack was in prison.

After Jack was released he found plenty of work, and had many presents given him by those who, knowing his honesty, had been thoroughly indignant at such treatment of him. So he managed to get along after that, and was able to pay all his debts.

* * * * *

Fifteen years later, and Jack Styles, now a man of 55, and his son, a fine-looking, promising young man of 25, were doing a fair business in the grocery line, in the city of W——, about twenty miles from their former home. So honorable were the dealings of this firm with all their customers that after they were once established in business, which at first was on a small scale, they found their receipts month by month increasing in a way that was very encouraging. Young Styles stood at the head of the concern, as Jack had very little education; still the latter made himself extremely useful in various ways about the store. After they had been about two years in business, Young Styles one day said to his father: "You remember Old Starbuck who once shut you up in jail?"

"I rather think I do," replied Jack, with a shudder.

"Well, he is living in this city on charity; he has spent his property, and drank himself almost to death, making him one of the most bloated, disagreeable-looking objects you ever saw."

"Is his wife living?" asked Mrs. Styles. "If she is I will surely go to see her, and help her if she is in need."

"I hope you will," said both Jack and his son, in a breath. "I think you will find her on A—— street, one the vilest in the city."

"If it is such a dangerous street you must go with me Jack. I would not like to go there alone."

"Indeed, I will," he replied.

So as soon as they had eaten dinner they set out for the house of Jack's old enemy, and after an hour's search found the old tippler and his wife in one of the meanest tenements of the city. Starbuck did not recognize Jack, for he was then suffering from a fit of delirium tremens, and hardly knew one person from another, but his wife at once called him by name, seemed delighted to see him, and her thanks for the presents he carried her, which consisted in a good supply of the choicest articles his grocery store afforded, were unbounded. But both Jack and his wife assured her this was not the last of their gifts to her, and they left her in apparently better spirits than they found her.

In a few days Starbuck died, and then Jack and his wife took his widow to their own comfortable home, where, according to the wishes of both, she spent the remainder of her life, which was not many years. She was a lady of great culture, having been brought up and accustomed to move in the best circles of society, and at the time she married Starbuck he, too, was in high standing and possessed of much wealth, but through the baleful effects of liquor he was brought down to poverty and disgrace, while Jack, from leading a temperate, industrious, honest life, was brought up from small beginnings to a comfortable, respectable position.

PITTSFIELD, Mass.

Wellington and Monsoon.

Though scrupulous in small things, Monsoon practiced kleptomania on a monster scale. When the British entered a town, the Commissary General hastened to the nearest church and appropriated whatever plate or costly reliquaries he could seize. He had once a narrow escape from hanging, after having actually undergone a drum-head court-martial, and thenceforth he abandoned his evil courses. When the allied armies entered Paris, Wellington was, of course, the constant figure of attraction. At a grand fete he took wine (or went through the form of it) with any officer whose face was remembered by him. The Commissary Monsoon was a guest at this entertainment, and Wellington's eye rested on him. Up went the hand and glass as a signal, and bows were well-nigh exchanged, when thundered out the Duke:

"Oh, I thought I had hanged you at Badajos. Never mind; I'll do it next time. I drink your health."

A Wedding Incident.

The pretty bride and manly bridegroom had exchanged their vows. The organ was almost bursting with the melody of the "Wedding March;" the crowd in the church on Lexington avenue and Fifth street, New York, was slowly wending its way to the open air, when everybody present was startled by a woman's voice in the vestibule, crying: "He's got my watch; that one there, going away; catch him, somebody, quick!" She moved toward him, pointing her finger at him, so that all might know him. A policeman came up and took him from the men who had already captured him. A little girl saw him drop the watch on the pavement, where it was found, slightly damaged. At the station-house he snatched a piece of paper found on him by the officer, and tried to swallow it; but he was choked to prevent that, his jaws forced open, and the paper drawn out. It was a memorandum of weddings, funerals, consecrations, and other ceremonies for the week at various churches where crowds would assemble, and afforded him opportunities for plying his industry.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

THE Yukon river, in Alaska, is navigable for steamers 2,500 miles.

The official statistics of the production of salt in Germany show that the number of salt mines or salt works in the several states is sixty-one. They give employment to 6,632 workmen, and the annual production of salt is 157,500,000 pounds.

ANYONE who thinks Japan is an illiterate country is sadly mistaken. During last year 47,000,000 articles passed through the Japanese post. Twenty-five million letters were sent, 10,000,000 post cards and 9,500,000 newspapers. In 1870 there were less than 1,000 post-offices in Japan; now there are over 5,000.

THE postal carriers in the cities of the United States carried 809,000,000 pieces of mail matter during the past year, being 339,000 to each carrier. In New York over 224,000,000 pieces were distributed; in Philadelphia 107,000,000; Chicago, 69,000,000; Boston, 45,000,000; St. Louis, 32,000,000; Cincinnati, 21,000,000; Baltimore, 20,000,000; Brooklyn, 18,000,000; San Francisco, 17,000,000; Cleveland, 12,000,000; Detroit, 11,000,000; Buffalo, 10,000,000.

AFTER all the arguments about deep plowing and subsoiling, and going below the surface in order to get the best yield, it appears that the total value of the leading crops for 1877 alone was $1,600,000,000, while the mine products for twenty-five years—from 1849 to 1875—were only a few millions more. This confirms, too, the well-understood principle of political economy that, taking the numbers who engage in it, mining is the least profitable employment.

THE first case of fever appeared at Memphis this year on July 10, but it was not declared epidemic until August 9. During the prevalence of the plague there were 1,503 cases and 498 deaths; last year there were 17,600 cases and 5,160 deaths. It appears from the history of this year's epidemic that the fever in Memphis did not spring from imported germs, and that manifestly yellow-fever germs can survive the frost, for the winter of 1878–79 was of unusual severity throughout the South. Special directions have been published in regard to the treatment of infected localities in Memphis.

Improved Methods of Execution.

It is not surprising that from time to time attention is recalled to the barbarous nature of the mode of executing the death penalty in this country. Hanging by the neck till the criminal is dead is obviously a relic of barbarism; it is the most primitive, the most various, the least prompt and uniform and certain of the modes of execution which have been or could be devised. If the object of an execution now-a-days be to insure the rapid and certain death of the criminal without any probability of intervening accident, delay or torture, hanging by a cord and trusting to the rough adjustment of weight and fall which the "eye and experience" of an ignorant hangman can afford, is the most fallible of methods, and must of necessity from time to time lead to painful scenes of torture. The garotillo is, perhaps, of all existing foreign methods of legal execution the most rapid and certain; but without proposing any one substitute for our own responsibility—whether the carbonic acid chamber, the massive electric discharge, or any other method—it is certain that any scientific man or commission could very speedily devise a prompt and bloodless certain mode of execution which would be free from the clumsiness and uncertainty of hanging. The retention of this ancient relic of past barbarism is not creditable to our jurisprudence.—British Medical Journal.

The Hotel Car in England.

The American Car Company has commenced the introduction of the hotel-cars on the English railways, and even the London Times speaks approvingly of this innovation. That paper says: "Thanks to the ready ingenuity of the Americans, it will be possible in a few days to breakfast not too early in Yorkshire, to read and answer half a dozen letters, to travel luxuriously to the metropolis, enjoying a good hot lunch by the way, have three clear hours for business, and, after a hot dinner of several courses on the road, be to bed in Yorkshire soon after 10. This supplies the greatest want of railway traveling. Its pace, its inevitable delays, and the tendency to make up lost time by cutting shorter the brief stoppings allowed for refreshments, not to speak of the impossibility of taking one's food in a decent or healthy fashion with bell, whistles, and the railway guard sounding all about you, render the traveling meal a misery and a terror. The cars are similar to those in America as to dimensions as well as plan, in which a large party of gentlemen and ladies can move about with pleasure from drawing-room to dining-room, order and enjoy luxurious breakfasts and dinners, and finally emerge, feeling and looking as if they were only stepping out of their own hall doors. Thus is traveling and refreshment associated. The American sleeper, hotel and drawing-room coaches having now established themselves, the American system of railway traveling will probably be adopted in other respects.

THE next Legislature of Texas, it is thought, will adopt a provision making it a misdemeanor, at least, if not a felony, for a railway company to give, or for anyone not a paid employe of a railroad or a pauper to accept, a free pass.

J. WILKES BOOTH.

Story of His Death, as Retold by Capt. E. Doherty.

After Garrett had designated the direction of the barn, Capt. Doherty said to Sergt. Boston Corbett, "Dismount your men, detail a few to watch the house, and bring the remainder here." Capt. Doherty then surrounded the barn with his men, and, going to the front door, placed a lighted candle, which he had held in his hand for some time, near the front entrance of the barn, and in the vicinity of a large crack or opening. Unlocking the door, Capt. Doherty called upon those in the barn to come out and surrender; but no answer was made to this and subsequent frequent and loud demands of a like character. Capt. Doherty then passed around among the sentinels who surrounded the barn, when he was informed that whispering and the moving of hay had been heard from the inside. Capt. Doherty then said, "If you don't come out, I'll set fire to the building and burn you out." As there was no answer even to this, Capt. Doherty ordered Corp. Newgarten to pile some shavings and hay in the opening, and set fire to it. While he was piling it up, a voice said to the corporal, "If you come back there I'll put a bullet through you." Capt. Doherty, who was standing near Newgarten, then quietly ordered him to desist, and determined to wait till daylight before making any further demonstrations.

At this time quite a long conversation took place between Capt. Doherty and J. Wilkes Booth. The former, after hearing the threat of the latter, called again for a surrender, when Booth replied, "Who do you take us for?" Capt. Doherty responded, "It don't make any difference who I take you for, I'm going to arrest you." Then Booth said, "Boys, fetch me a stretcher; another stain in our glorious banner." Walking around the barn and returning near the door, Capt. Doherty heard whispered conversation between Booth and Harrold from the inside. Booth then said, aloud, "I am crippled and alone; give me a chance for my life; draw your men up at twenty-five paces, and I will come out." Capt. Doherty replied, "I didn't come here to fight, but to capture you. I have fifty men here, and can do it."

In the meantime Harrold had approached the door, when Capt. Doherty said to him, "Let me see your hands," when Harrold put both hands out through the door, and Capt. Doherty, seizing them, handed Harrold over to the corporal at the door. While this conversation was going on, and as Capt. Doherty was in the act of taking Harrold out of the front door, the barn had been fired in the rear. The flames burst suddenly forth. Booth, who had left his position in the barn to the right of the opening referred to above, near the candle, took a position in the center of the barn facing the door, and, raising his carbine, pointed it in the direction of Harrold and Capt. Doherty, when Sergt. Corbett, who was stationed at one of the openings in the barn to the left of Booth, observing the movement, leveled a large-sized Colt's revolver at Booth and fired, intending to hit him in the arm for the purpose of disabling him, but the ball entered his neck, about one inch from the same point that Booth shot President Lincoln.

On hearing the shot, and being at the time ignorant of the movement or intention of Booth, Capt. Doherty supposed that he had shot himself rather than surrender, when the officers rushed into the barn, and by the light of the burning building saw Booth with the carbine between his legs, one of his crutches having dropped, and Booth in the act of falling forward, when Capt. Doherty caught him with both arms around the body and carried him outside of the barn and laid him down; but, the heat becoming too intense, Capt. Doherty ordered him removed under the veranda of the Garrett mansion.

Soldiers were then dispatched in different directions for doctors, but only one, Dr. Urquart, could be found, he arriving about 6 a. m., and after probing the wound pronounced it fatal, the ball having ranged upward, cutting a vital part. From the time Booth was shot, 5 o'clock, to the time he expired, two hours later, he spoke but once, and that was to Capt. Doherty, shortly before 6 o'clock, when he said to him, "Hands." Capt. Doherty lifted up his hands, when Booth looked at them for an instant, and, shaking his head, exclaimed, "Useless, useless." A short time after this he became unconscious, and so remained until he expired.

Capt. Doherty, after wrapping the body of Booth in his saddle-blanket, sewed the blanket together with his own hands, and, having placed the body on a cart, which was obtained from an old negro residing about two miles distant, proceeded with the body and the prisoner, Harrold, to Belle Plain, where the Ide was waiting the return of the command, which arrived at 6 p. m., when the Ide proceeded to Washington, where the body of Booth and the prisoner, Harrold, were turned over to the officers of the United States iron-clad monitor Montauk. Capt. Doherty having received orders from the department commander so to do. This was at 3 o'clock on the morning of the 27th.

In reference to the different statements that Booth was never captured nor killed, and that he is alive to-day, Capt. Doherty says it is the sheerest nonsense in the world, as, in the first place, Capt. Doherty knew J. Wilkes Booth personally, and was in his company at the National Hotel at Washington about two months previous to the assassination. In the second place, at the post-mortem examination, held on the 27th of April, Booth was fully identified by Dr. May, his attending physician, who had performed an operation on his neck, and by Mr. Dawson, proprietor of the National Hotel, where he boarded during his residence in Washington, and also by other well-known citizens, to the full satisfaction of the Government. In the third place, after the body of Booth was buried in a cell in the penitentiary at the Arsenal at Washington, the remains were delivered over to his relatives, four years later, upon application to President Johnson, and they now rest in the family vault near Baltimore, Md., thus proving that the members of his own family recognize the fact that the body lying there is the last mortal remains of J. Wilkes Booth.

Harrold was tried, convicted and hanged with Payne, Atzerot, and Mrs. Surratt, in July, 1865.

A total reward of $150,000 was offered by the Government, the city of Washington, and the city of Baltimore. The reward of $100,000 offered by the Government was paid, but those offered by the cities of Washington and Baltimore were repudiated. Capt. Doherty entered suit in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia to recover the $20,000 offered by the city of Washington, but the suit was decided against his claim, the court holding that the city of Washington had no authority in law to offer the reward. Capt. Doherty appealed the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it is now pending, and from whence a decision is expected to be reached this year. In the case of the claim against the city of Baltimore, which offered $30,000 for the arrest of the assassin, Capt. Doherty did not sue to recover, the Mayor and Aldermen telling him point blank that they would not pay it, as the reward was offered under a previous administration. This claim has now lapsed by limitation.

Of the $100,000 offered by the Government, $75,000 was paid on the basis of prize-money in the navy. The command consisted of twenty-six enlisted men, two citizens (detectives), and one commissioned officer. The commission appointed to distribute the money consisted of Judge Advocate General Holt and Gen. E. D. Townsend, Adjutant General of the army, who awarded to Capt. Doherty $7,500; to each of the citizen detectives $4,000; to Sergt. Boston Corbett and Sergt. Wandell $2,200 each, the commission deciding that the fact of Corbett having shot Booth did not entitle him to more than the non-commissioned officer of the same rank who was also present at the capture. Gen. Lafayette C. Baker, chief detective of the War Department, was held to be the same as an Admiral, who detaches a ship and orders it to another squadron. In transitu, that ship captures a prize, and Capt. Doherty, being in position as Captain of the ship, received two-twentieths of the whole amount, while the Admiral, who in this case was Gen. Baker, received one-twentieth, or $3,750. The remainder of $75,000 was distributed pro rata among the men.

Capt. Doherty was informed from high authority that "a wheelbarrow full of claims" were put in for this reward, almost every detective in the United States representing that he was entitled to a share. The adjustment of this mass of claims occupied the members of the commission a little over a year before they could determine who were entitled to the reward.

Victor Hugo on the Future.

Victor Hugo, as Honorary President of a secular education congress in France, recently addressed it to a rhapsody, in which he says: "Youth is the future. You teach the youth, you prepare the future. This preparation is useful, this teaching is necessary to make the man of to-morrow. The man of to-morrow is the universal republic. The republic is union, unity, harmony, light, industry, creating comfort, abolition of conflicts between man and man, nation and nation, abolition of the law of death, and establishment of the law of life. The time of sanguinary and terrible revolutionary necessities is past. For what remains to be done the unconquerable law of progress suffices. Great battles we have still to fight—battles the evident necessity of which does not disturb the sirenty of thinkers, battles in which revolutionary energy will equal monarchical obstinacy, battles in which force joined with might will overthrow violence allied with usurpation—superb, glorious, enthusiastic, decisive battles, the issue of which is not doubtful, and which will be the Hastings and the Austerlitz of humanity. Citizens, the time of the dissolution of the Old World has arrived. The old despotisms are condemned by the Providential law. Every day which passes buries them still deeper in annihilation. The republic is the future."—Sacramento Record-Union.

Those Who Died at Pompeii.

Though the victims of the great eruption of Vesuvius in A. D. 79 lived so long ago, they were our fellow-creatures, and it is impossible to recall their fate—especially, one might think, to recall it on the spot—without a feeling of horror. Sir William Gell estimated the number of people who perished at 1,300; but during recent excavations so many bodies have been found that it seems to have been far greater; and when we consider that, closely as the inhabitants were packed, Pompeii was still but a little place, the proportion of deaths appears large. It is, of course, satisfactory to the antiquary to reflect that the misfortunes of Pompeii have been a great gain to modern knowledge. The manners of the ancient Romans are better known to us by what has been discovered here under the ashes than by all the pictures or statues or writings existing elsewhere. The town had been very recently rebuilt, and the remains are chiefly of one period; but the decorations are remarkable for their rarity as well as for their freshness. In fact, the state of pictorial art in the first century would be almost unknown to us but for the frescoes from the house of the tragic poet and the beautiful wall-paintings now in the Naples Museum.—London Saturday Review.

A covey of partridges, nine in number, were hatched on the farm of Samuel Garner, near Harmoneyville, N. J., during last summer. Mr. Garner fed and took care of them as best he could, and they remained on his farm until recently, when a large hawk pounced rapaciously upon one of them. This so frightened the rest that they flew against Mr. Garner's house with such violence as to kill themselves instantly.

WHERE SHALL WE BURY THE PAST

BY OLA REED M'CHRISTIE.

Where shall we bury the past?
Shall we bury it in Lethe's sea,
Where no echo may ring of its beautiful years,
To gladden our hearts or awaken our tears?
Shall we go to our dreams with no thought of hours,
And cherish no wreaths of its fast-faded flowers?
Shall we lay it aside with ne'er a prayer,
To sleep in oblivion? Oh, no; not there!

Where shall we bury the past?
Shall we lower it down in the tomb?
While the breathings of woe peal its requiem there—
Though it crushes our hearts, breathe there the last prayer!
Shall the dew-drops of sorrow fall over it now,
And the cold veil of death overshadow its brow?
Though it's stolen our young life's fragrance and bloom—
Ah, no! we cannot lower it into the tomb.

Where shall we bury the past?
Shall we bury it in memory's cell?
It has taught us of life by its mystic power;
It has taught us that death's wave may come any hour;
It has taught us sweet lessons of patience and love;
It has taught us to long for the mansions above,
Though it oft crushed our hearts, yet they rose in prayer!
In memory's cell—we will bury it there.

SHEET music—Children crying in bed.

"ARISE, my sole, arise," sang the cruel parent, as he raised Alfonso off the front stoop.

WHEN we look West we feel that we would like to see an Indian fall instead of an Indian summer.

IT has been ascertained, after patient investigation, that courtships average three tons of coal each.

THE most universally-known man in the world is the man who will sing when he don't know how.

ACCORDING to the scriptures "nothing was made in vain," but a freshly-engaged young woman comes near it.

IT is easier for a rich man to go through a needless sigh than to sign a subscription for a new church.

A DEACON, who had lent the horse that ran away and threw the clergyman, claimed credit for spreading the gospel.

SPURGEON recently said that now, as in the days of Luther, men stand staring at the truth like cows at a new gate.

You may meet with twenty men in the day who stutter, but you never heard of a woman who had an impediment in her speech.

'Twas in Arabia's sunny land
He wooed his bonny bride;
His umber Ella, rain or shine,
Was ever by his side;
But now he does not Kaffir her;
No love tales does he tell her;
He'd fain Bedouin something else—
Alas! Poor Arab Ella.
—Yawcob Strauss.

"NO," SAID a Texas lawyer, as he placed a couple of loaded Derringers on the table before him, "the fact that the witness is a desperate man will not deter me from asking him such questions as I may deem proper."

'Twas Sunday morn, and Rev. Jones
Was breakfasting with Gray.
Said Jones, "Another bit of steak,
As I have to preach to-day."
"Guess I'll brace up a little, too,"
Said Gray, his eyes a-glisten,
And he helped himself to a hunk of meat,
"For you know I have to listen."
—Cincinnati Gazette.

A TOURIST, new to the beer-drinking ways of the good people of Munich, asked the lady presiding at a bier halle if her customers did not frequently become intoxicated. "Santa Maria, sir, they never get drunk, but they sometimes burst!"

A GENTLEMAN met a stranger on the street, grasped his hand cordially, and exclaimed, in tones of polite and uncertain recognition: "Mr. Brown, I believe?" "If you believe that," calmly replied the stranger, whose name was Hamilton, "you'll believe anything."

COL. OLD STYLE—"This is, indeed, a pleasure. I never see your Ladyship but I feel that I am ten years younger! Lady New Style—(who hasn't been to the lyceum for nothing)—"Indeed, Colonel? Then you should avoid me. A meeting or two more and you'll be in your second childhood."

THE following communication from a resident of Arkansas was received by a prominent commission house of New Orleans: "Your bill received; would remit, but am in bed—shot behind my counter. Will be up in a day or two. One man who shot me is dead; the other ran away. We are rid of both and could spare more."

Wanted to See the Editor.

A man on the cars was offered a newspaper. He took it, looked at the heading, and then threw it aside with disgust, and remarked:

"I don't want any news from that paper."

"I supposed everybody read it in these parts," I answered. "Has it been pitching into you?"

"Pitching into me? Great Cæsar! I should think it had. But you just let me meet the editor of that paper!"

"You never make anything by striking an editor," I say; "better grin and bear it."

"Yes," that's all right for you to say; but just let me meet that man! I'll show him how to run a newspaper."

"What did he do?"

"Do? He did a deal. Here's how it is; I often go to Springfield on the evening and come home on the first train in the morning. Well, one night I met an old crony, and we went to Music Hall and the theater. When we came out we met some friends. Of course I could not get right out, so I treated; in fact, we were having a pretty good time, when some fellow came in and began to raise a row. In less than no time the police were in and had us. The next morning I was hauled before the court and fined $7.40. I did not care much, because I gave a false name, and I knew my wife couldn't find it out, but the next morning I'll be eternally confused if that very paper didn't have it all in, and my name, too."

"Did your wife see it?"

"I should say she did."

"Did she make a fuss?"

"Fuss! Godfrey Elihu! Are you married?"—Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

A Sleeping Car Comedy.

A traveler on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad relates the following incident of travel:

A middle-aged married couple have turned in next to me, having boarded the train at a way station. They have evidently been much hurried and are out of humor, for the wife is fretful and excited, and the husband growls above his breath in this style:

"Now, I'll just bet you didn't put my night-shirt in!"

"S'hush! It's in the basket in the corner," replies the woman.

"I've looked in the basket and 'taint there. I s'pose you put it at the bottom under the vittals."

"In the vittals, indeed! Why, John, what on e-a-r-th are you a-doin'?"

"I'm looking for my shirt."

"Don't! that's the wrong basket. You've gone and spilt them pickles all over the bed! I never seen such a man!"

"Never mind, Mary, you needn't tell the whole car." This in a whisper peculiar to the stage.

"Looking for your old shirt in the dinner-basket! I don't see what any body wants a night-shirt for on a railroad, anyhow," retorted the indignant female; and there was a whirring sound which indicated that she had pitched the missing article in his face just in time to choke off a wicked rejoinder.

"'Sposin' the cars were to run off the track?" added she. "You'd be a nice pictur wadin' out of a swamp or rolling down a bank in that, wouldn't you?"

"I'd be just as comfortable and purty as you in that—"

"S'hush! You'll disgrace both of us with your tongue." Whimpering.

"My tongue. Well, d—n me, Mary, if—"

"There now, you're cursing me—you—you—" Breaks off to sob.

There's where she had him.

I fancied shortly after hearing the resonant and agreeable sound of a kiss, but perhaps it was only the angels, and I dropped off to sleep again. On the following day I saw the middle-aged couple seated opposite munching pickles and fried chicken at intervals—as docile and happy a couple as any body may wish to see.

St. Joe.

—Rabbit-shooting is again the order of the day hereabouts.

—Drs. Ed. and Jake White and Messrs. Wm. Johnson and Jake White are off on a hunt in the south woods.

—We notice that one of the boys who was wanted some time since for burglarizing at Auburn Junction, is again at home. The boys doubtless learned a lesson that will be of future benefit.

—Another row occurred at "Blue Ruin" on Friday night. The fellow who put that extra head on Frank Uim, a few days ago, undertook to abuse a cripple—a man with no hands—but some bystander, whose name we could not learn, was manly enough to espouse the cause of the cripple and pummel the quarrelsome individual beautifully. It is said that while this pugilistic gent is spending his money at the saloon, his family is without the necessaries of life.

—School commenced on Monday last with a good attendance, nearly fifty scolars putting in an appearance. Miss Mary Young teaches the young ideas how to improve their time, with John Eogle as assistant.

—The St. Joe elevators are again open for business, having been blockaded for some time. Wheat is worth $1.25, oats 33 cents, and old corn 40 cents.

—O. S. Spitler, who was so terribly hurt a few weeks ago, has been entirely cured by a remedy which the weighman recently prescribed—a receipt for 40 pounds of wheat.

—Six car loads of hogs were shipped from this station last week, Bryan parties shipping two car-loads and S. Shilling four. Solomon was formerly king bee in the hog trade, but we fear he is losing ground; however, he has his whole family—or at least the boy part of it—engaged in the business.

—A protracted meeting conducted by the Dunkards has been in progress for the last week, at the Sodom schoolhouse It seems that the Sodomites are a hard people to reform, as there has been no warming up as yet.

—The county school superintendent is being censured pretty sharply by some of the teachers in this vicinity. A certain teacher informs us that, a few weeks previous to the institute meeting at Garrett, he was examed at Auburn and got a grade of 60, 65 and 80, on three different branches; at Garrett he was examined on the balance of the branches, receiving no license, but a grade-paper on which the Auburn grade was not given at all. Can anybody tell why?

A. A. A.

Newville.

—The first day of winter.

—School commenced in Newville this morning.

—Some of the farmers in this neighborhood would like to have another pleasant month, as they are not through husking corn.

—Now that thanksgiving is over, turkeys and preachers will have a rest.

—A wedding will probably be the result of the frequent visits of one of our young men to St Joe. ALPHA.

—Auditor Robbins is somewhat indisposed, the result of close confinement and overwork in the office.

Not Surprised.

When we consider the little attention paid to the laws of health, we are not surprised at the indifference manifested in relation to purity of daily food. If all articles were like Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder, this indifference might answer; their perfect wholesomeness would insure us against all evil consequences.

Special Announcement.

We take pleasure in announcing that we have made arrangements with the publishers of the STATE SENTINEL which enable us to make the following very liberal offer:

To all persons who pay their subscription account to date, we will send the COURIER and WEEKLY SENTINEL one year for $2.50 in advance. In addition to this we will make each subscriber a present of "THE LAW OF THE FARM," by JAS. B. MCCRELLIS, of the Indiana bar. This valuable phamphlet ought to be in the hands of every farmer in the state. The work embraces the following subjects:

1st. How to buy a farm.
2nd. How far the farm extends, or its proper boundaries.
3rd What the deed of a farm includes.
4th The farmer's rights in the road.
5th As to farm fences.
6th As to estray and trespassing animals.
7th The farmer's liabilities for his animals.
8th Of dogs—the farmer's liability for and protection against.
9th Of water rights and drainage.
10th Of trespassing on the farm.
11th The rights of adjoining proprietors to fruit and other trees on and near boundary lines.

The INDIANA WEEKLY STATE SENTINEL is an eight-page paper, (the same as the COURIER) and will contain a supplement of two additional pages about half of the time. It is the recognized organ of the democracy of Indiana, and will always be found full of news of a general character. Its editorials present strong argument in favor of economy and against class legislation, and its agricultural department is adapted to the wants of every farmer.

Remember that the $2.50 must be paid in advance, and the COURIER subscription account must be paid to date, in order to secure this liberal offer. tf.

WHAT PAYS BEST AFTER HARVEST

Is a serious consideration of its cost and profits, and how to economize by comparing your own experience with that of others in farm labor.

Only $1.15 a Year,

Will place you in possession of the only newspaper that gives the actual experience and experiments of practical farming.

"The Cincinnati WEEKLY ENQUIRER, is the medium through which producers of every class make known their own experience, and seek that of others."

"The best teacher of farming, is the farmer himself! A fact fully demonstrated in the department (two pages a week) devoted to the farmer and his household in the WEEKLY ENQUIRER."

"Every department is complete."

"It is worth $100.00 a year to farmers, but costs only $1.15."

"The best is the cheapest."

"It always has the news in advance of all others."

"There is none better."

"It is the best political friend the people have, advocating its democracy upon the principles of justice and equity to all."

"It is the original greenbacker."

Such are a few of the many compliments paid to the Cincinnati ENQUIRER, by the press throughout the country.

The merits of its editorials, agricultural, political, correspondence, literary, telegraphic news and commercial departments combine to make it all that is required in an A No. 1, first-class family journal.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIER.

AN ABLE AND ELOQUENT ADDRESS DELIVERED BY MR W. L. PENFIELD,

At a Meeting of the Auburn Soldiers Association.

The character of the American soldier is not yet completely formed. By this I do not say that he is without character, but merely that that character is not yet fully fashioned in all of its essential features, and that it is for the future to bring forth the ultimate type of the American soldier, as we are to behold him, in full figure, in galleries of art, or on the pages of history.

The type of our soldier of the revolution was bold and masculine, yet it was not purely and distinctly American. His qualities were as much English as American,—the solid and enduring qualities of patience, sturdy courage, stubborn resistance, indomitable resolution which carried our armies barefooted and bleeding over the ices and snows of Valley Forge, which distinguished alike the humblest soldier and the august chieftain, and which at last crowned our armies with victory. Nor were those qualities then so much marked with those other ornaments of the military spirit,—the light and graceful movement of a sudden inspiration, the swift and brilliant sallies that for a moment flash across the field of battle, the invincible outbursts of a buoyant enthusiasm that pierce the enemy like a sheet of flame. It is these qualities which shed such an eclat over carnage, and by which war, losing none of its dangers, seems to lose half its terrors. Toward the development of these qualities the character of the American soldier is tending. At no time has their display been so conspicuous and frequent as in the latest periods of our military history. Compare the soldier of '76 with him of '61; and we make the comparison not for the purpose of blame or praise, but to ascertain in what direction the character of our soldier is tending. The plain, simple republican virtues of the former are worthy the adoration they receive. Their steadfastness, their immovable integrity, their inflexible devotion, their unyielding resolution, their robust and manly courage were qualities pre-eminently fitted for defensive warfare by inferior numbers in a vast and unbroken wilderness. Nor do I say that as military qualities, though less shining, they are inferior or less valuable to a great and peace-loving and peace-making republic. The glamour of arms, the seductions of military glory have always been the insidious and deadly foes to republics. And if wars are sometimes a necessity we might perhaps diminish their evils and their frequency by diminishing their glare. The qualities and achievements of the revolutionary soldier were of a solid, grave and sober character, and when victory crowned their armies it was the triumph of reason; and the imagination did not encircle it with the halo of military glory. Their military virtues and achievements were such that peace seemed even more glorious than war, and we then entered upon a career of peace that was not broken by any war of really national dimensions until '61. But witness through that period the gradual transformation in the character of the American soldier. Growing less heavy and stolid, he becomes more light and venturesome; less steadfast and obstinate in resistance, he becomes more impetuous and resistless in the charge. Comparing the leading soldiers of '76 with those of '61, for spontaneous outbursts of supero heroism, for dazzling feats of daring, for resplendent valor, what former American soldier can compare with Custer, flaming like an ancient war-god, his head wreathed with the aureole of battle; or Sheridan, or Stonewall Jackson; falling like thunderbolts, riving and blasting all they strike; or Hooker, like the Olympian Jove, darting into the upper air and hurling the red lightnings of war above the clouds? Such heroic actions are the poems of war; they constitute the grand epic of our American soldier whose character is illustrated in an action which is not only a deed but a poem, and in which is expressed the gathered energy and courage of a lifetime. It is by some such deed or by some heroic word that the representative character of the soldier is bodied forth like the springing into life of the picture on the canvas by a single stroke of the master's brush. The deed of Leonidas at Thermopylæ, the words of the Spartan mother to her son, "Return with thy shield or upon it;" the laconic words, "I came, I saw, I conquered," by Cæsar; the battle-cry of the round heads, "the Lord of hosts, the Lord of hosts is with us;" the signal of Nelson, "England expects every man to do his duty;" the words of Napoleon at the Pyramids,—each of these sayings which are not only words but deeds, are representative of the character of the soldier of the various nations in the ages when they were spoken. But while Spartan and Roman, and Anglo Saxon and Gaul, equally illustrious for heroism, have been distinguished one above the other for various martial qualities, the American soldier is destined to present a new type, combining those qualities in the highest degree of excellency.

For what is it that gives us the grandest type of the soldier? What are the causes and conditions that mould and determine his character? What is the one royal quality of the soldier? Is it observance of discipline? No. Is it devotion to duty? No. Is it fidelity? No. Is it promptitude and precision? No. Is it courage? No. It is manliness. Manliness is the soil in which all the soldier's virtues find root; it is the air which they all breathe; it is the light in which they all bloom. Manliness is the grand soldier's quality; for in it, are all his other virtues embraced,—observance of discipline, devotion to duty, fidelity, promptitude, precision and courage. And in what age, what country in the world, what institutions other than our own can a royal manhood find for its development so rich a soil, so warm a sun, so genial an air, so clear a purple sky, so joyous and broad a freedom?

Neither the government, nor the laws, nor the institutions, nor the frozen conventionalities of old customs limit the expansion or retard the growth of a complete manhood. Man in all the movements of his thoughts and in all the motions of his limbs is free. From the humblest soldier in the ranks to the command of an army and to the chief magistracy of the nation the avenue is open to all. Ambition points the way, and with a grand ambition realized, comes a grand renown. Example not only inspires emulation, but it educates, and in this splendid competition in which all the citizens of the republic are contesting for the palm, who can estimate the stimulating influences on the development of men afforded by so majestic a spectacle? It is the national school of culture of sturdy, self-reliant and independent manhood, out of which the highest possible type of the soldier may be developed. But this development will be the slow growth of time, the ripened fruitage of centuries. Not until all the people of the nation have become of one kin and blood, not until their customs, their thoughts, their sympathies and sentiments have been knit and blended together into the web of a unique, peculiar and perfect nationality, not until these nourishing juices of manhood have given tone and blood to many generations yet unborn shall we see the highest type of the soldier of the American republic. But we behold the manifold causes which are co-operating in this higher development. We are the creatures of the present, or of a recent civilization. And if the present civilization is the product of past men, present men are in turn the product of civilization. The typical soldier of the revolution was the product of that civilization; and well will you realize how much the southern soldier was the product of a slow civilization.

How much brighter is the promise for the future? The slow methods and barbarous spirit of a former age are passing away. The stage coach gives way to the lightning express, the old messenger to electricity; ignorance shrinks back in the blaze of enlightenment, and superstition, specter-like and grinning ghastly, skulks backward in the gloom, while free thought and free manhood march grandly and proudly upon the stage. The soldier of the American republic, unlike the Greek Hoplite or legionary of Rome, is not appalled and cowed with fear at sight of a comet as a sign of ill-omen, and going into battle already half-whipped by his own superstitious fear. His imagination is emancipated from the fear of witches, signs and incantations; his reason is becoming more and more luminous and clear; his thoughts and his motions are more confident and swift, and he keeps quick step with the electric music of the age. May we not then see foreshadowed the coming of a mightier soldier, weaponed from the rich armory of a more superb civilization, with the illuminations of a higher intelligence, with the effulgence of a brighter genius and the exhalation of a loftier spirit and a grander courage?

But you ask, what are the evidences that America is to produce so grand a type of a soldier? And the answer comes in a myriad forms. The abundant vintage, that pours in purple tides from the wine press, showing us that effect flows out from cause, teaches us how to answer. The harvest answers back to the springtime; and autumn, that sets a golden crown on every upland, autumn, stained with the rich dyes and gorgeous colors of the orient, showers her answer back upon springtime, in profuse masses of crimson fruits and in the golden billows of waving corn; aye, she answers back with lute-throated voice, mellow and rich as the music of the spheres. And as the summer and autumn give answer unto spring, so does the republic, her history and her destiny give answer to the question, what a race of men and what a harvest of deeds she is to bring forth.

The republic is continental in her domain. Boundless as the continent and free as the air is the growth here of manhood and manhood's virtue which is courage. There is "Room! Room to turn round in, to breathe and be free,

And to grow to be giant, to sail as at sea
With speed of the wind, on a steed with his mane,
To the wind, without pathway or route or a rein."

And grafted on this sturdy stem, this vigorous stock of manhood will be found the consummate fruit, the exquisite flower of intelligence which is genius. Genius, too, not perverted and distorted by oppression, not stifled and suffocated by the sickly pestilential atmosphere of despotism, but buoyant with life and health and hope, and all glowing with the flush of freedom. For to genius freedom is the air and the light and space, which are necessary to supply every condition of highest development. Man, too, is influenced by his surroundings, and participates in the spirit of his age. His thoughts move on the wings of the lightning, they pierce the bosom of the tempest, they penetrate the depths of the sea, and like the arrows of light shot from the quiver of the sun, his thoughts fall on a region of night and it is covered with a luminous cloud of glory, and races, tribes and nations look up startled with the splendor of the rising of the new dawn upon midnoon. The irradiations of the coming of such a civilization we behold through the open portals of the future; we already hear her approach like the majestic rustlings of the aurora, and from zenith to horizon, and from pole to pole, the ineffable splendor and glory of her coming covers the firmament as with the shadow of a faint light. The American will not be uninfluenced by his environment, and intelligence, genius, thought, will expand to the comprehension of the new universe dawning upon the old. And thus the future will answer back to the present. And thus will the future American soldier combine the highest manhood virtue and manhood courage with a new and still higher order of intelligence and thought, and, endowed with such qualities and faculties, he will have the gravest tasks and the most solemn responsibilities to call forth all his powers in action. For his will be the task, his the responsibility of defending this fabric of the new and rising civilization with all of its trophies and monuments, with all its heir-looms and treasures, and in which is to be garnered up all the unfathomable riches of the universe

Will not such qualities, combined with such responsibilities, contribute to the development of a nobler type of hero, uniting clemency with courage, wisdom with daring, the illumination of genius with vigor in action?

All the conditions are present in America for the development of the highest type of the soldier. From the lowest rank to the crowning summit of honor in the republic the most glittering prizes are open to all. He, too, will have the richest inheritance to protect. He, too, will have the holiest of causes to defend, for the cause of the republic will be always just, since it is the cause of freedom. All will contribute to his development,—a royal manhood, a superior intelligence, a superb civilization, a righteous cause, and above all, the unmatched and peerless republic to defend, preserve and protect. What other soldier, in any age, had so much to stimulate either his ambition or his patriotism? The most glittering prizes to be won, the grandest of nations to defend. Here the career of ambition will be the career also of patriotism; here aspiration and patriotism do not conflict, selfishness and disinterestedness co-operate in harmonious union to the development of the ideal patriot and soldier. Napoleon fought not so much inspired by patriotism as stimulated by selfishness. Had he been a pure patriot, he could not have become the emperor of France; and he became such not by the voice of his country, but by violating her constitution and trampling under foot her laws. If France had paved out by law an open way for all men to the headship of the nation Napoleon would have been not only a hero but a patriot—his own ambition would have been in harmony and parallel with the glory of his country. But when his egotism began to transcend his patriotism, when he sought, what the law would not permit, to be the first man in France, the heart of France began to shrink and fall away from him, and he was swallowed up in the abyss which yawned under that very France which he had loved so well, and next only to himself.

But in America, enlightened selfishness and patriotism go hand in hand, and our soldier is spurred onward and upward alike by the stimulus of self-love and by pure and lofty inspirations of patriotism. And the sentiment of patriotism, swelling and exultant, has in America for its support moral and physical grandeur of country, grandeur of climate, of scenery, of sun and sky, of letters and of art, of institutions and laws. Her mountains and valleys, her streams and lakes, her woodlands and prairies, her cities and churches, her railroads and telegraphs, her mines and forests, place her in the front rank, by duty and by destiny, of all the nations of the world. They also are to the soldier the source of love and pride, and admiration and courage. The thought of them nerves his arm for the conflict; he cherishes the matchless inheritance which he is defending, while he is conscious that towards him are directed the regards of the world; and clustering together in his mind are the early traditions, the hallowed memories, the golden legends of the republic, which bound up in one volume constitute our history; and the voice of its wisdom, the aspirations of its martyrs, the sufferings of the oppressed, the hopes of the free, all blending like a prayer, fulfill the dome of the republic with a majestic requiem for the dead which is also a pæan of victory for the living. Inspired by their sublime presence, as if by the palpable touch of the infinite, history beckons him onward and upward to the future, out of whose bosom springs forth destiny like the fairy from the bosom of the flowers. This destiny, coming forth from the future, hails and acclaims the republic, as the first born of liberty, the flower of the centuries, and crowns her mistress over the world by her spirit, by her ideas and by her example. Such, then, are the incentives, the conditions and circumstances which will mould and fashion the American soldier. Boundless freedom of development of manhood courage, the efflorescence of thought which is genius, a matchless civilization, the righteous cause of the republic, which is the propogation of liberty, moral and physical grandeur of country, a delicious scenery, an air whose kiss is soft and voluptuous as the breath of June; cloud-capped mountains, crystal lakes and streams, a glorious history and a still more glorious destiny will all influence and mould the perfect type of royal manhood—the ideal soldier of the republic.

Already has America produced to the world a new and loftier race of heroes Alexander was a military adventurer soulless and sordid, who illustrated his semi-savage nature—by his brutal atrocities and by dying at last in a drunken orgy; Cæsar's hands were impurpled in the blood of the expiring republic; Charles XII, in his life and exploits, was half hero and half madman; Conde was untrue to his own nobler impulses and shed lustre more over a despot than over a nation; Cromwell throttled the commonwealth with an iron hand, and was dictator only because he could not be a despot crowned; and America alone has produced heroes, who like Washington, Jackson, Scott and Grant, laurel-crowned victors in war, have been unsullied patriots in peace, who having been true to the past, were not false to the future, and who have caused no detriment to the republic. From these abundant materials, then, let us delineate America's type of the soldier whom the republic will place alongside the Marii, the Hannibals, the Fredericks and Napoleons. In courage and manhood vigor, he will not be wanting. His thoughts luminous and clear, will signalize the abundant fountain of a superior intelligence. Wielding immense armies, all will respond obedient to the touch of the single master will, whose command will be as the decree of fate. And with this exalted power, with this force and brilliancy of genius, with marvels of conception will be beheld prodigies of valor in execution. Yet, great as will be his glory in wars, the moral grandeur of his character, will shine with the luster of a grander renown in peace. The ends he aims at will be God, his country and truth. And thus will America build in full figure her statue of her representative soldier, and placing him in the gallery of history, side by side with the illustrious names, and grand renowns of the past will point out to the nations of the earth for their admiration and for their instruction; how gracious in opportunity, how salutary in influence, how expanding, and elevating, and ennobling in the architecture of manhood are the institutions of the republic.

"It's the Regular Thing, You Know."

As one of the most prominet young burglars of San Francisco was walking out of court the other day, just after having secured an acquittal regarding his latest job by a prompt and business like "divvy" with the powers that be at the usual rates, a well-to-do but anxious looking stranger touched his arm and beckoned him into a doorway.

"You are 'Teddy the Ferret,' aren't you," asked the gentleman, "the man who was tried to-day for safe-cracking?"

"Well, wot of it!" replied the housebreaker.

"Why, just this—you'll excuse my speaking so low—but the fact is, I've come all the way from the San Joaquin to look up a party in your line of business."

"Have, eh?"

"Yes—I—well, I've a little proposition to make to you."

"Exactly," said the Ferret, calmly; "you're a bank cashier down in the foot-hills."

"How did you know that?" stammered the gentleman, much amazed.

"And your cash and accounts are to be gone over by the directors on the first, and as you can't realize on your stocks, you want me to gag you some time next week, shoot your hat full of holes, find the combination in your breast pocket book, and go through the safe in the regular way."

"Great heavens, man! how did you find all that out?"

"Why, I guessed it. It's the regular thing, you know. Got three orders to attend to ahead of yours now. Lemme see. Can't do anything for you next week, but might give you Wednesday and Thursday of the week after. How'll that suit you?"

The cashier said he thought he could make that do, and in less than five minutes they had stuck a bargain and arranged the whole affair.

THE USUAL $65 MACHINE REDUCED TO $25.

$150 per Week Made Easy.

Horse and Wagon Free to Agt's

The CHEAPEST and BEST in the World.

Too Long in Use to Doubt its Superior MERITS

No Money to Pay until Machine is Delivered to you and Examined.

It makes the shuttle, double-thread, lock-stitch, (the same on both sides of the work) which received the highest reward at the Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia, Pa., 1876. And is complete with a larger assortment of attachments for fine work than any other machine, and reduced to only $25.

It is an easy and pleasant machine to operate, requires the least care, produces every variety of work, and will last until the next century begins. Strong, simple, rapid and efficient.

Use it once and you will use no other. The money cheerfully refunded if it will not outwork and outlast any machine at double the price.

Agents sell them faster than any other in consequence of their being the "best at the lowest price."

Each machine throughly warranted with written guarantee for five years. Kept in order free of charge; money refunded at once if not satisfactory.

It is the most solid, reliable, and satisfactory machine ever invented for all kinds of family work. It is an acknowleged unequivocal mechanical success, thoroughly tested and used in thousands of homes. An efficient, silent, rapid, reliable and ever-ready helper to the weary wife or seamstress, it will do the work of a family for a lifetime, or it will earn from $1 to $5 per day for any-one who wishes to sew for a living. This machine costs less than half the price of any new machine of like quality. Has extra long, large-sized shuttle, easily removed. Extra large-sized bobbins, holding [illegible] yards of thread, doing away with the frequent rewinding of bobbins. It is built for strength and constant hard work. Interchangeable working parts, manufactured of fine polished steel. Will run for years without repairs; is simple to learn, easy to manage, understood perfectly in an hour, and always ready in a moment to do every description of heavy or fine work, at less cost or trouble than any other machine at any price ever did or can do. It will sew anything a needle can pierce, from lace or cambric to heavy cloth or harness, with any kind of thread, and will run off twenty yards per minute; it uses strong, straight needles and never breaks them. It cannot miss or drop a stitch, ravel or break the thread. If you have any other machine, buy this and have a better one. The ease and rapidity of its motion and quality of its work are its best recommendations. It will hem, fell, tuck, braid, cord, bind, gather, quilt, ruffle, pleat, fold, scallop, shirr, roll, baste, embroider, run up braids, etc., with elegance, ease and quickness, unsurpassed by any machine ever invented.

BEWARE OF IMPOSITION.

The price for our new machines are less than those asked by dealers in second-hand, rebuilt and refinished machines, or those selling out old stock to close up business, many such inferior and old style machines being offered as new at reduced prices; beware of imposition and only buy new machines. There are no new first-class machines offered as low as the "FAMILY," by many dollars.

Machines Sent for Examination Before Payment of Bill.

Extraordinary inducements offered to clergymen, teachers, storekeepers, etc., to act as agents. Horse and wagon furnished free. For testimonials see descriptive books, mailed free with samples of work, liberal terms, circulars, etc. Address,

THE EAST.

Several shirt and collar factories at Troy, N. Y., were destroyed by fire a few nights since, causing a loss of about $350,000. Eighteen hundred men and women are thrown out of employment....A Boston dispatch announces the death of Erastus B. Bigelow, the well-known inventor.

Rev. E. C. Wines, of New York, the eminent prison reformer, is dead.

THE WEST.

The Cincinnati Common Council has passed an ordinance granting the use of the streets of the city for the laying of service pipes through which steam is to be delivered to every house, just as gas is now delivered.

Advices from Los Pinos Agency to Dec. 5 report the commission as "progressing finely. Jack has so far proved the most valuable witness yet examined, answering all questions promptly, keeping nothing back. He claims the removal of the agency was the commencement of the trouble; that on an elevation of 8,700 feet, with the frost every month of the year, farming was impossible; that he and his bands received no rations for a year, which he claims was a violation of the treaty of 1868; that his engagement with the troops was a fair fight. He calls Douglass a squaw man for having attacked the agency, and insists that a white man under the same circumstances would have fought Thornburgh.

The Chicago Commercial Club gave Gen. Grant a grand banquet at the Grand Pacific Hotel, in that city, on the evening of the 6th inst. In the afternoon of the same day the General performed the ceremony of planting a tree at South Park, in the southern section of the city, in the presence of a large and distinguished assemblage.

There was an exciting scene, and almost a bloody tragedy, at Los Pinos Indian Agency, in Colorado, on the 6th of December. Twenty-five Ute savages presented themselves before the Adams Peace Commission, to hear the demand for the surrender of the ringleaders in the Meeker massacre. A council was held in the agency buildings, at which Gens. Adams and Hatch stated their orders with great perspicuity and emphasis, the savages meeting them with complaints and equivocations, in which Ouray, the supposed friendly chief, was not behind any of the others. At last, when the discussion had assumed an angry phase, a "pipe of peace" was passed from one barbarian hand to another, untasted, and knives and revolvers appeared instanter. The whites, outnumbered five to one, seized their rifles and made ready for hostilities, but, after a few moments of silence, the negotiations were resumed. The Indians then presented their ultimatum, which was to the effect that the savages to be surrendered by them should be taken to Washington for trial, the tribe fearing that justice would not be done near the scenes of their crimes. Gen. Hatch promised to communicate with Secretary Schurz regarding this proposition, and Ouray agreed to bring in twelve of the more conspicuous participants in the White River massacre. The Indians were extremely arrogant in their demeanor. The action of Ouray was a surprise to the Commissioners, who had reckoned all along on his co-operation in any step they might choose to take.

Gen. Grant left Chicago, after a six days' sojourn, on the morning of Tuesday, 9th inst., and journeyed to Indianapolis where he received a cordial reception. At Logansport a halt of an hour or so was made to give the people an opportunity of paying their respects to the General. He was escorted to one of the hotels, and mounted upon a flimsy platform that had been hastily constructed. Of course all the local celebrities crowded on the frail structure, and the result was a crash and a fall, just while the Mayor was in the midst of "the greatest effort of his life"—the delivery of a long-winded reception speech. Gen. Grant was precipitated a couple of feet, but coolly picked himself up, looked around to see what had become of the man who was talking to him, and grimly remarked: "Well, the platform's gone; what shall I stand on?" Fortunately, the fall was slight, and the Mayor at once resumed.

The records of the Health Department show that since the first week of September the number of deaths from the first-named disease has been 141, and from diphtheria 220....The State Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry of Ohio was in session at Cincinnati last week. Resolutions were adopted condemning the practice of newspapers in advertising nostrums and things of an immoral nature, and urging members to withdraw their patronage from such newspapers. It was recommended that memorials be sent to Congress asking for legislation to remove the evils of oppression in the matter of freight transportation on railroads.

THE SOUTH

Mr. Forwood, President of the Liverpool (Eng.) Chamber of Commerce, who has just completed a tour of the Southern States, said in a speech at Cincinnati the other day that he was satisfied that the American cotton crop would this year be increased by at least 200,000 bales.

Ex-President Grant arrived at Louisville, Ky., on his travels, on the morning of the 10th inst., and was accorded an enthusiastic reception. The city was gayly decorated with bunting and mottoes, and in the evening was brilliantly illuminated. The Governor of the State and the Mayor of the city delivered addresses of welcome, and the ex-President responded briefly. The General gave a reception in the parlors of the Louisville Hotel, and in the evening there was a grand ball at the Gault House, in which he participated.

The Public Printer now enforces the law under which Congressmen can get their speeches published in pamphlet form after their appearance in the Record at the cost of paper and presswork, and requires payment in advance. President Hayes has proffered to Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, the appointment of Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court whenever the vacancy shall occur that is anticipated by the resignation of Justice Hunt, who is permanently disabled, and will retire as soon as Congress passes a bill enabling him to do so with full pay.

The Cabinet at Washington held a meeting to determine what ought to be done with the Utes to be given up for trial and punishment. There was a difference of opinion as to the course to be pursued, which occasioned a good deal of dissatisfaction. The conclusion finally reached was that the Indians should not be tried either in Colorado or New Mexico, for the reason that they would not be allowed a fair chance by the inhabitants of that State and Territory. If no suitable spot can be selected in the West, then the location for the trial will be left to the Indian Commissioner.

CONGRESSIONAL SUMMARY.

Immediately after the reading of the journal on Monday, Dec. 8, in the Senate, Mr. Voorhees offered a resolution declaring that the Senate had heard with deep regret the proposition of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, in their messages, to inaugurate a new and uncalled-for financial agitation and the destruction of the most necessary currency now in circulation; and that the interests of the country require the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver on conditions of exact equality, and that it is the part of a wise financial policy to maintain the present volume of greenbacks in circulation, and to preserve their legal-tender quality unrestricted and unimpaired as to legal effect. Laid on the table, to be called up hereafter. Messrs. Vest, Kirkwood and Walker were appointed to co-operate with the House committee in arranging the funeral of Representative Lay. The Senate then adjourned as a mark of respect for the deceased. Bills introduced: By Mr. Paddock, improving the Missouri river; by Mr. Teller, removing the Ute Indians from Colorado; by Mr. Hoar, in regard to the Ponca Indians. Presidential appointments: Receivers of Public Moneys—F. J. Burton at East Saginaw, Mich.; George B. Folsom, Taylors Falls, Minn.; Thomas H. Pressnell, Duluth, Minn.; Paul C. Sletten, Crookston, Minn.; Robert M. Harrington, Beatrice, Neb. Registers of the Land Office—Soren Listoe, Fergus Falls, Minn.; Alexander I. Buckworth, North Platte, Neb....In the House, Mr. Clark, of Missouri, announced the death of his colleague Alfred M. Lay, and offered resolutions of respect, which were adopted, and Messrs. Clark, Morrison, Hill, Bingham, Chalmers, Calkins, and Ryan were appointed a committee to arrange the funeral. Adjourned.

Mr. Bayard, from the Senate Finance Committee, on the 9th inst., recommended the indefinite postponement of bills for the interchange of subsidiary silver coin and for the issue of $10,000,000 4-per-cent. bonds to pay arrears of pensions. So ordered. A communication from the Postmaster General, asking for an additional appropriation of $2,000,000 for inland mail transportation for the present year, was received. A report from Gen. Sheridan was laid before the Senate in regard to stations for troops to prevent Indian raids. Mr. Davis' (W. Va.) resolution calling for a statement of payments since the war on claims growing out of the rebellion was considered, but not decided. In executive session, Secretary McCrary was confirmed as United States Circuit Judge for the Eighth circuit. Lucien B. Crooker and Alfred M. Jones were confirmed Collectors of Internal Revenue for the Second and Third districts of Illinois....In the House, a constitutional amendment was offered by Mr. Pound, of Wisconsin, providing that after the 4th of March, 1885, the President and Vice President shall hold their offices for six years, and shall be ineligible for more than one term consecutively, and that members of Congress shall be elected for three years. Bills were introduced: By Mr. F. Wood (by request), to amend the law relating to internal revenue, proposing a drawback on all manufactured tobacco of the taxes paid beyond the rate of 16 cents per pound prior to the 1st of May, 1879; also, exempting from import duty classical antiquities and ancient coins and medals; also, relating to the treaty-making power, making the consent of the House necessary to confirm treaties that affect the revenue; by Mr. Myers, to retire the national-bank circulation; by Mr. Newberry, to authorize the issue of $50,000,000 gold and silver certificates, and to provide a redemption fund therefor; by Mr. Jones, of Texas, to repeal the Resumption act; by Mr. Price, of Iowa, requiring national-bank reserves to be in coin; by Mr. Wells, to abolish reports of Congressional debates. Two sets of resolutions were offered, by Messrs. Myers and Gillette, sympathizing with the suffering in Ireland, and a joint resolution to adjourn from the 19th inst. to the 6th of January. Mr. Warner offered a bill taxing legal-tender notes. There were 200 bills introduced in the House on that day.

Mr. Davis' resolution, calling for information in regard to war claims, was passed by the Senate on the 10th; also, the joint resolution for a recess from Dec. 19 to Jan. 6; also, a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information in regard to the effect on the revenue of the repeal of the duty on tea and coffee in 1872. In executive session, the nomination of Alexander Ramsey, of Minnesota, for Secretary of War, was confirmed without reference. Bills introduced: By Mr. Davis, of Illinois, to authorize the erection of a statue to ex-Chief Justice Tom Marshall; by Mr. Cockrell, making St. Louis, Kansas City and St. Joseph ports of entry. On motion of Mr. Ingalls, the bill for the relief of the Central Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company was indefinitely postponed. Mr. Morrill offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for a tabulated statement showing the total amount of claims growing out of the late war presented to and rejected by the Treasury Department from March 4, 1861, to March 4, 1879, and also of all like claims now there pending. The nomination of Charles Beardsley, of Iowa, to be Fourth Auditor of Treasury, was confirmed; also Horatio G. Sickel, Pension Agent, Philadelphia; William H. Hays, United States District Judge for Kentucky; Charles P. James, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; Albert Johnson, Surveyor General for Colorado....In the House, an amendment to the constitution was introduced declaring that polygamy shall not exist in the United States. Mr. Gillette introduced a bill establishing a Government for the District of Columbia. Mr. Wait, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill amending the Revised Statutes so as to allow any vessel not of the United States to unload at any port of delivery in a customs collection district after due entry of said vessel and cargo at the port of entry in said district. The House discussed the bill relative to the publication of Supreme Court reports, and, after a good deal of talk, it was passed.

The Solar System.

Bodies, like the moon, tell of times in the remote future. The moon is eighty-one times smaller than the earth. Its surface is thirteen times smaller. The moon is believed to be a dead body and to represent the earth as it will be thousands upon thousands of years hence. The solar system, as a whole, forces upon us the belief that the system has arrived at its present stage by development. Every orbit in the system moves in the same direction, and in the same manner. This is clearly the result of a law; and, as clearly, the law is the result of process; if we could only find out what that process was, we should know all there is to know. The whole system was once part of a tremendous whole. The great disk was formed by the gathering in of the matter existing in the heavens. From this radiated the various masses which formed the planets, and the central mass of the sun was left to control the entire system. As the earth has for ages swept around the sun, so the earth has for ages swept on to its surface masses of meteoric matter. Ah, my friends, it is no idle dream. The air we breathe, the food we eat, and the earth which produces it—yes, even the very dust of our bodies—was once a part of the heavens. The heavens were once our home.—Prof. Proctor.

Fire Eccentricities in Deadwood.

Men engaged in cleaning up the lot formerly occupied by Sam Soyster's Ark, Wednesday, unearthed a trunk which was in the building at the time of the fire. The trunk upon being touched fell to pieces, exposing the contents, a quantity of ladies' wearing apparel, the property of Mrs. Soyster. The clothes were burned to a cinder, and when exposed to the air crumbled to ashes, but, strange to say, a roll of greenbacks which was in a pocket of one of the dresses, containing $75, was found intact, the bills being scarcely singed. This rivals the discovery made on the morning after the fire, when Judge McLaughlin's safe was opened, which exposed a lot of gold-dust that had been melted into a lump by the intense heat, while a sum of paper money in the same drawer, wrapped in an old sock, escaped untouched.—Deadwood (Dakota) Pioneer.

Condemned Drugs.

By order of the Special Drug Examiner of Boston, nearly 4,000 pounds of worthless rhubarb were condemned in the early part of last month. It was of no use, whatsoever, as a medicine, and was ordered to be disposed of, according to the United States Drug law, by burning or exportation. It could not be burned, so was sent below the outer light and thrown overboard. Some barrels have floated ashore, six of which have been sent to Boston for sale. Fortunately, it fell into honest hands, and will not be used.—Boston Advertiser.

CLIMBING FOR LIFE.

How Three Men Were Treed by a Bear and a Wounded Buck.

[Jersey Shore (Pa.) Cor. Philadelphia Times.]

Dr. Bob Grier and a party of sportsmen of this place returned from a big hunt in the wilds of Potter county to-day, about twenty miles northwest of Coudersport, where they spent a week in pursuit of game. Grier is well known as a great fox-hunter and lover of the chase, and on this occasion he met with an adventure that is worth relating. Thursday last he left his party at the cabin where they were encamped in the forest, for the purpose of visiting a lumber camp about four miles away, to see an acquaintance. He slung his Remington over his shoulder, thinking he might get a shot at a deer or a bear. About half way between the cabin and the lumber camp was a stage road but little traveled. As he crossed the road he came suddenly on a large buck. He fired, inflicting a slight wound, which served only to irritate the animal. The buck made a dash for him, and he was compelled to climb a tree, having barely time to escape being trampled to death. In his flight Bob dropped his rifle, and he had no other weapon except the ordinary hunter's knife. His situation was anything but comfortable, but as there was a possibility of relief from a passing team he felt disposed to make the best of the situation.

After he had been up the tree about an hour he heard the crack of a rifle, and almost immediately two of his companions, by the name of Sutton and Cole, came rushing by, pursued by a bear of unusual size and activity. They took refuge on a wild cherry tree, which parted in two trunks a few feet above the ground, one part leaning slightly and very rotten, the whole looking like two trees. Once up the tree they were safe from immediate harm, if the bear could be kept from climbing after them. In the meantime Dr. Bob, in a fit of desperation, concluded to risk an encounter with the buck. In preparing to descend he took the precaution to fasten his knife, the only weapon he possessed, by a piece of twine to his person, so that it might not be lost if it dropped from his hand. Close by a hemlock had fallen, and the roots at one end and the branches at the other kept the trunk of the tree about two feet from the ground, making a place of retreat to which he could resort if hard pressed. He descended cautiously, but the enraged animal was on the alert and at once rushed upon him. His great strength was no match for the buck, which crushed him to the earth and tried to stamp him to death. On his hands and knees, mangled and bleeding, he succeeded in reaching the fallen hemlock and crawled under the trunk. The buck could just touch him with its feet, but could not harm him. Anxiety and pain were wearing Bob out when he heard a crackling noise at the root of the tree and a sharp cry of pain from the buck, which is a familiar sound to the experienced hunter. Peering out cautiously he found the deer securely held by the knotted roots of the tree, and his right leg dangling loosely, it having been broken in the efforts to escape. He was satisfied from the desperate struggles of the animal that it could not extricate itself, and watching a favorable opportunity he plunged his knife into the buck's heart and sank down exhausted.

At this moment Dr. Holmes, who resided some miles from that place, and who was attending a patient at the lumber camp, drove up and found Dr. Grier, who was an old acquaintance, lying upon the ground almost exhausted from loss of blood. He took Grier into the wagon and, after leaving a revolver and knife in sight of the men up the cherry tree, drove off to the camp for help.

Meantime the bear, after many ineffectual attempts to climb the tree, gave it up, and apparently relaxed his watchfulness by lying down at some distance from the tree. Sutton at this time thought that at least one of them might escape, and broached the idea to Cole, who objected, knowing that relief would soon arrive. Watching an opportunity Sutton descended the tree quietly without being observed, and, after moving cautiously for some distance, sprung to his feet and started for the cabin with the speed of the wind. Meeting the relief party hurrying up to their assistance, he returned with them to the rescue of Cole. Meanwhile the bear had got up and moved to the foot of the tree, when, apparently missing one of the men, he renewed his efforts to climb it. Suddenly the decayed part of the tree fell with a crash. The bear was somewhat stunned, but fortunately Cole was not hurt, and he started for the revolver and knife, which he secured. The bear pursued and overtook him and hugged him around the body. Cole fired, but did not inflict a sufficient wound to make the bear relax its hold. He fired a second and a third shot, with no better result. But one more bullet now remained in the pistol. He felt softly on the bear's breast to find the location of his heart from its pulsations, and, pressing the muzzle of the pistol to the spot, fired, when the bear gave a heavy groan and rolled over dead, and Cole sunk exhausted by its body. In a few minutes seven hardy lumbermen came to his relief. His wounds, though painful, were not serious.

A Strange Experience.

Mrs. Jennie Lewis, a well-known resident of Reno, has just returned from a trip to Europe. During her absence she removed from her ear a shell which had been lodged there for over thirty years. Mrs. Lewis says that when a child she was holding a small shell to her ear and trying to hear it "roar." While so doing the shell, which is hardly a quarter of an inch in diameter, slipped into the passage of the ear. Efforts to dislodge it were unsuccessful, and only drove it farther in. It remained there for ten years, causing occasional pains, when a surgical operation for its removal was attempted. The operation was performed in Illinois, where Mrs. Lewis' parents were then living. It was extremely painful, and induced excessive bleeding, but was unsuccessful. For twenty years more the shell remained in the ear, completely obstructing the passage. This summer, while on her homeward voyage across the Atlantic, Mrs. Lewis was one day seated on deck, engaged in picking with a pin the ear which harbored the shell. To her great joy and surprise she found that the shell which had so long been firmly fixed was loosened, and that it moved under the pressure of the pin. She worked away at it in great excitement for a few minutes, and at last the long-imprisoned shell was extricated. A surgeon on board the steamer was greatly interested in the case, and declared he had never in his life heard of such an experience. Mrs. Lewis still keeps the shell, and shows it to her acquaintances when telling its story.—Reno (Nev.) Gazette.

The Cultivation of the Oyster.

From an illustrated article by Mrs. S. B. Herrick, in Scribner's Monthly, descriptive of the unique methods pursued in "The Johns Hopkins University" of Baltimore, we quote the following extract from the forthcoming report of the Summer School of Biology connected with the institution:

"The investigations regarding the development of the oyster have led to the important and unexpected conclusion that the breeding habits of the American oysters are so different from those of the oysters of Europe that the methods of artificial oyster propagation which have been carried on to such perfection in France and elsewhere must in this country be replaced or supplemented by others. The eggs of the European oyster are fertilized and hatched within the shell of the parent, and are retained there until the young are ready to attach themselves. The most critical period in the life of the young is the time when they are discharged from the parent shell to swim in the water until they find a place to settle down for life. The adult oysters are accordingly placed, at the breeding season, in inlets or basins, among tiles which are prepared to furnish a surface for the attachment of the young as soon as they escape from the shell of the parent.

"The eggs of the American oyster are discharged into the water before they are fertilized, and, as fertilization in the open sea is a matter of chance, this is the period of greatest mortality. The experiments of the last summer have shown that the eggs can be artificially fertilized in the laboratory, in a small quantity of water, and the greatest danger to the young can thus be escaped. Since the young American oyster swims at large in the open sea during the time which the oysters of Europe pass inside the shell of the mother, the tile system of culture would seem to be impracticable, for the tides and currents might carry the young twenty miles or more from the tiles before they were old enough to attach themselves. The proper method in this country seems to be the placing of great numbers of artificially-fertilized eggs in those waters which are shown by the presence of natural oyster-tanks to be favorable to the growth of the animals. While the French method may be pursued to the advantage of the cultivator, and may therefore be left to individual enterprise, the proposed method would be for the benefit of the whole community, and seems to be a proper field for action by the State."

Interesting Facts.

The tomb of Edward I., who died in 1301, was opened Jan. 2, 1770, after 463 years had elapsed. His body was almost perfect. Canute, the Dane, who crossed over to England in 1017, was found 1779 by the workmen who repaired Winchester Cathedral, where his body had reposed nearly 750 years, perfectly fresh. In 1569, three Roman soldiers, fully equipped with warlike implements, were dug out of peat in Ireland, where they had probably lain 1,500 years. Their bodies were perfectly fresh and plump. In the reign of James II. of England, after the fall of the church at Astley, in Warwickshire, there was taken up the corpse of Thomas Gray, Marquis of Dorset, who was buried the 10th of October, 1530, in the twenty-second year of Henry VII.; and, although it had lain there seventy-eight years, the eyes, hair, flesh, nails, and joints remained as though it had been but newly buried. Robert Braybrook, who was consecrated Bishop of London in 1331, and who died in 1404, and was buried in St. Paul's, was taken out of his tomb after the great fire in 1666, during the repairs of the cathedral, and, although he had lain there no less than 262 years, the body was found to be firm as to skin, hair, joints and nails. The Convent de St. Domingo was lately demolished in search of treasure supposed to be concealed there, and the body of Prince Rodriguez taken out, who had been buried alive in 1565, exactly as when placed 250 years before. His daughter, 2½ years of age, was lying at her father's feet, and as perfectly preserved as himself. The evidences of torture on him are fearfully apparent. The position of his hands shows that he was suspended by the body and neck until he died. Marks of the cord and the burning iron are deeply recorded on various parts of the body. His hair and beard are firm, his skin natural in hue and texture, without the least trace of decomposition in any part.—London Examiner.

Believes in Home Manufacture.

A Vermont man writes to the New York Evening Post on the obelisk question. He is disgusted with New York for going to Egypt for a monolith less than 100 feet high. He wants an American stone erected that will show posterity what we could do in that line. He says "the largest block of granite ever quarried in New England has been taken out at Woodbury, Vt. It was 230 feet long, thirteen to eighteen feet deep, fifteen feet wide, weighed 4,080 tons, and required 673 wedges with fifty pounds of powder to start it." If some one would set up a stone like that, no doubt the Vermont man would undertake to carve on it hieroglyphics that nobody could read, and in this way get considerably ahead of the ancients.

A Horse's Revenge.

"The society for the protection of animals against the cruelty of human animals is not remarkable for its activity in this country," writes the Paris correspondent of a London paper. "The police appear to think it no business of theirs when carters or coachmen brutally maltreat their horses in the streets, or when boys amuse themselves by torturing dogs and cats or whatever other creatures have the ill luck to fall into their hands. The horse would appear to be weary of the supineness of their supposed protectors, for they have taken the matter into their own hands, or rather into their own teeth and feet. A carter, by hard flogging of his three horses, got them to drag sixteen tons of coal to the foot of the steep hill which leads to the Boulevard Bessieres; but his powers of stimulation utterly failed to induce them to proceed any further—a thick steam rose up from their panting sides and nostrils. 'Budge!' said the fiend; and straightway the carter began to lash and swear. A crowd gathered around the ferocious beast, who abandoned the lash and began to bang his stick about their heads and to kick them with hob-nailed boots in the sides. The leader of the team took upon himself to protest against this extreme measure. He turned around, seized the carter's arm with his teeth, tossed him to the ground and trampled him with his hoofs; then seized him again with his teeth and tossed him about. The crowd and the police, which had looked approvingly on while he tortured the horses, interfered for the protection of the human monster, who was with great difficulty torn bleeding and mangled from the just equine resentment.

The Late Editor of the London Times.

John T. Delane, who died not long ago at London, was for thirty-six years the chief editor of the London Times, which he found a great newspaper, and made the greatest journal in England. Up to his day, the Times had been great in its news. Some of its "beats" during the Napoleonic contests have never been surpassed, and its fearless publication of facts touching high personages led to one or two of the greatest libel suits in the history of English journalism. Mr. Delane, the nephew of the previous financial manager of the paper, became in 1841 its chief editor at 24 years of age, and he made the paper great in two new particulars, with extraordinary success for twenty years and more; it reflected the sentiment of the English ruling class, and it was served by a body of men altogether superior in ability and character to any previously employed on English papers. Delane showed signal ability in choosing his agents, and an almost cynical contempt in the management of the paper for consistency. The paper first went hopelessly wrong under him in its treatment of the United States from 1861 on, and he had a rough tumble in a newspaper war with Richard Cobden about fifteen years ago, which sadly damaged Delane in popular estimation. The anonymous secrecy of English journalism has always left in the dark Delane's real work in making the Times what it has been, but he has generally had the credit of being the great master mind of the enterprise. Two years ago he resigned, and the paper since then has constantly shown the lack of brains and a strong hand.

Preservative of the Dead.

The United States Consul General at Berlin, Mr. Kreismann, has communicated to the Department of State a new process patented in Germany for preservation of the dead. The liquid used is prepared as follows: In 3,000 grammes of boiling water are dissolved 100 grammes of alum, 25 grammes of cooking salt, 12 grammes of saltpeter, 60 grammes of potash, and 10 grammes of arsenic acid. When cool it is filtered. To 10 liters of this liquid 4 liters of glycerine and 1 liter of methylic alcohol are added. The process of embalming is by saturating and impregnating the bodies with it. From 1½ to 5 liters of the liquid are used for a body.

Mr. Awtrey, the member of the Legislature who introduced the bill to reduce the rate of interest in Georgia to 8 per cent., has already violated the law by borrowing money from a bank at 12 per cent.

Minnesota has done a wise thing. At the November election a proposed amendment to the State constitution was submitted to popular vote, forbidding towns from incurring a bonded indebtedness to an amount larger than 5 per cent. of their assessed valuations. The amendment was carried by a vote of 65,143 for, to only 1,702 against it.

Illinois farmers do not devote themselves entirely to the production of corn and hogs. This year they raised 45,000,000 bushels of wheat—more than any State in the Union. Iowa raised 40,000,000; Minnesota 36,000,000, Nebraska 37,000,000. Kansas stood highest last year, but this year is the fourth on the list. A better system of cultivation and more care in gathering crops would double the product of every acre of tillable land in Illinois.

The Chicago Times of a recent date says: "Great depot projects are now the order of the day. It may be assured as definitely settled that early next spring the Pennsylvania road and the Alton and St. Louis will construct a monster depot, to cost $1,500,000, between Madison and Adams streets. There is, furthermore, every reason to believe that the Milwaukee and St. Paul line will also go into the scheme, and that the depot will be divided between those three great corporations."

Having long suffered the reproach of neglect of their dead, the Americans are beginning to become a monument-building people. A unique illustration of the new spirit was the placing of a shaft over the remains of Nancy Lincoln, mother of the President. For sixty years her grave in Spencer county, Ind., has lain neglected by her kith and kin. Recently there was placed thereon a beautiful white marble monument, bearing an inscription of the fact of her relationship to the great President.

The London Daily News correspondent at St. Petersburg sends some details as to the proposed railway from Orenburg to Tashkend. This purely strategical line will be 1,650 miles in length, and will cost, according to the Russian journal, about £11,500 a mile, making a total expenditure of nearly £20,000,000. That it can pay interest on its cost within any reasonable period is impossible; but this is to be remedied by the guarantee of 5 per cent. interest by a Russian railroad bank. Altogether, the scheme is not likely to tempt European capitalists.

Of all who have joined the bands of desperadoes and outlaws led by the James and Younger brothers in Missouri and adjoining Sates, more than half have "died with their boots on," killed during their raids or assassinated by private enemies. The last of those who have perished is Jesse James, the organizer and leader of the bank robberies, who was shot and killed near Joplin, Mo., some weeks ago. Jesse James had led more than a dozen successful robberies of banks and express trains, and was probably the boldest highwayman in civilized lands.

A water spaniel recently followed his master into a machine-shop in Pulaski, N. Y., and while wagging his tail briskly got too close to an oily shaft which was making 150 revolutions per minute. The hairs were long, and were wrapped once around the shaft before the dog got ready to wag his tail the other way. The shaft made thirty-seven and a half revolutions in fifteen seconds—and the dog likewise, before his master discovered his predicament and released him. After his adventure the spaniel was very much out of breath, but was not seriously hurt.

The San Francisco correspondent of the Chicago Journal says that over 100 millionaires are now resident in San Francisco. The same authority says that Mr. Mackey was born in Dublin in 1835, came here when a boy, and worked for William H. Webb, the ship-builder, in New York, whence he shipped to California in 1852, in one of his employer's vessels. It wa not until 1863 that he made a substantial start being then associated with a brother of Gov. Walker of Virginia. Mr. Mackey's wealth is anything from $15,000,000 to to $30,000,000; yet he is content to pass a great portion of his life in a temperature of near 1(0 degrees down in his mine.

It is a fact well worth noting that the exports of domestic merchandise from the United States were larger, in value during the last fiscal year than during any previous one in the history of this country. It is a second fact worth noting that the exports of all sorts were in value $711,637,398, and the total imports $445,777,775—so that the former were to the latter as 6½ to 4, and surpassed them by $265,859,623. The exports were reckoned in mixed gold and currency value; the imposts only in gold. Allowing for this, we still have a balance of about $250,000,000 on the export side.

An Iowa landlord bound his tenant with a cast-iron leasing contract, which provided that the rents, "whether due or to become due, shall be a perpetual lien on any crops and other personal property of the lessee, whether the same be exempt from execution or not." The legal force of this clause was made the chief issue in a lawsuit. It was argued that a contract making subject to seizure property which the statute declared to be exempt from execution is contrary to public policy. This is the first case of the kind which has been before the Iowa courts, and the Iowa Supreme Court recently decided to the effect that the contract was valid.

A return to the Legislature in 1876 showed the income of English endowed charities to be £258,710. Reports made since show the income to be now over $6,000,000, and the officers known as "Official Trustees of Charitable Funds" hold stocks and securities which in 1872 amounted to nearly $27,000,000, divided into 6,616 separate accounts. The management and control of charities are vested, subjected to considerable limitation, in Commissioners, and the Court of Chancery also has large powers in dealing with charitable trusts. A great many charities, which had in course of time become misapplied, have during the past ten years been rigorously overhauled and restored to usefulness.

The ex-Khedive of Egypt has just lost one of his wives from his harem. A handsome young Italian painter named D'Ella went sketching through the harem grounds. He noticed a beautiful odalisk at one of the windows, and in some way managed to establish a telegraphic communication with her, which was soon followed by a romantic elopement and marriage. How he managed to get her out of the harem is a mystery. The young couple are now living happily at Foggia, and since they are man and wife the Khedive can't claim his former favorite. He is determined in future to keep his wives from the windows for fear of more elopements. The young lady in question is said to be a French woman.

Effect of Music on Animals.

It is certain that the songs of birds, as well as most other forms of musical sounds, have as their express object the charming of female ears. It is fairly certain, too, that the presence of a quasi-melodic element in many of the animal cries, e. g. the neighing of the horse, is to be accounted for by its being pleasurable to the ears of the particular animal's companions. One may even suppose that in many sounds, as the crowing of the cock, the individual that utters the music enjoys the result of its own performances. The question naturally arises whether sensibility to the pleasurable character of musical sounds is not much more widely diffused among animals than would appear from the quantity of music which they produce. The fact that birds, when confined, are excited and stimulated to song by the sound of other birds or other musical sounds seems to point to the presence of a wide and catholic musical sensibility. The many stories of the wonderful effects of music in taming wild animals, if there is any truth in them, would appear to show that species which are incapable of uttering anything like musical sounds are endowed with the corresponding sensibility. It is a well-attested fact, we believe, that the dolphin follows a ship in which music is performed. Brehm says that the horse is delighted with the note of a trumpet. And, according to the same authority, even the dog, which is apparently tormented by the notes of a soprano voice, remains undisturbed by those of a bass voice.—Cornhill Magazine.

What He Mistook for a Dog.

A young man who had recently arrived from the East was engaged at the United States fishing establishment on McCloud river. One day last week he took a towboat and pulled up the river a short distance, crossed to the opposite side, and prepared to go ashore. Just as he was stepping out of the boat, the young man looked up on the bank over his head and saw what he thought was a large mastiff dog. "Some of those Indians have stolen him," he thought to himself, "and I will take him home with me." Climbing the trail with difficulty, he was soon face to face with his mastiff. He whistled, and snapped his thumb and fingers coaxingly, but, instead of taking his advances kindly, the animal uttered a low growl, and, oscillating his tail from side to side, prepared to go for that young man. The latter, now terribly alarmed, started for his boat, tumbling headlong down the hill, and just managed to get into his craft and push it into the stream as an immense specimen of the California lion landed upon the shore. Of course, the lion would not take to the water, so the young man was safe; but he says he shall be careful how he makes overtures to strange dogs in a strange country after this. He was entirely unarmed at the time, and, after he got into his boat, heard the growls of another in the bush, showing that there was evidently a pair of the "creatures."—Portland Oregonian.

FARM NOTES.

Hints About Winter Farm Work.

[From the American Agriculturist for December.]

The close of the year is usually an interesting period to the farmer, but the end of the present one is especially so. For some years past, there has not been much to encourage farmers in their work, except, perhaps, the general feeling, that "bad times" could not last forever, and at length a change must come. After many seasons of patient waiting, the looked-for change has arrived, and as we go through our barns and granaries, and consult our accounts, we may find that our work this present year has repaid us for many past poor ones. There are exceptions here, as in all other business. Until recently, dairying was discouraging indeed, but, with the advance in prices to more than double the rates current only three months ago, cheerfulness has succeeded to despondency.

The promise for the next year is very encouraging; a greatly increased breadth of wheat has been sown, and the weather has been favorable for its growth. Indeed, in some cases, the wheat and rye are too vigorous, and if warm weather occurs with rains this month the growth may be too luxuriant.

Fodder Stacks.—As a precaution against rain and melting snow, the tops of fodder-stacks may be covered with a few sheaves of long straw, tightly bound about the top of the stack, or to a stake thrust down into its center for a few feet.

Top Dressing.—If manure is needed for winter grain now is the time to apply it. It may be used fresh and coarse without losing much in value. Every straw spread over the wheat is of great benefit. Mulching is a protection against extremes of both heat and cold, and preserves the crop during sudden and severe changes of the weather.

Pasturing Fall Grain.—If the fall grain is in danger of jointing it should be pastured without delay. It is often a great help to the wheat or rye to let sheep or calves upon it. They eat down luxurious growth and tread the soil firmly about the roots. If no other stock are available for this purpose cows may be let into the winter grain fields.

Potatoes and Roots.—Pits and cellars should be examined as to the condition of the contents. If too warm, ample ventilation must be given at once. A freezing temperature will not injure roots or potatoes if they are exposed to it but a short time. If they are found too warm in the cellar, the heaps should be turned over and well aired. The best temperature is one just above the freezing point.

The Leisure of Winter.—While there is always something to do about a farm, the winter season offers considerable leisure for the farmer. For the best use of this time nothing can be more profitable than to procure and use a small select library of books of an instructive kind. To read for amusement only is not recommended, because information of a valuable kind can be procured in such a form as to be interesting and agreeable.

Surface Drains.—If not already made, ample drains should be provided to free the fields from surface water. Drains that have been plowed out may need clearing in places with spade or hoe, that the water may pass off readily. In laying out open drains the slopes should be so made that the water will no flow off too rapidly—with a gentle inclination only; in this case much of the water will soak into the soil, and will not wash away either the soil or any manure that is on the slopes.

Swamp Muck.—Where there is a supply of swamp muck, as much of it as convenient may be usefully spread over the yards, pens and stables as an absorbent. If swamp muck contains 2 per cent. of nitrogen—some has been found to contain even more—a ton is worth $10 for this ingredient alone at its market price. No ordinary stable manure is so rich in nitrogen as that. A muck bed may well be said to be invaluable, for one acre, three feet deep, furnishes 2,500 tons, having a value, at the above figures, equal to $25,000.

Management of Manure.—The barnyard is the field for winter work. Much may be done here by skillful management. Manure, so long as it is frozen, remains unchanged, and the preparation of the manure in the best manner for use in the spring makes no progress. Make a central heap in the yard, and by means of a few planks and a wheelbarrow move the manure from the stable each day to this heap. If the heap is built up square and made four feet high it will keep warm in the coldest weather, and while warm it will ferment and rot.

Turning Manure.—A large heap may be turned by beginning at each end and throwing off the manure to a distance of about three feet; gradually move it from each end, until there are two heaps. After the manure has remained in this way for a few weeks, replace the two heaps, making one heap again, thus turning the manure very thoroughly twice. In turning, the manure should be shaken thoroughly apart, and all the lumps broken. Two loads of manure so treated do as much immediate good as will three of coarse, lumpy stuff.

The Granary and Cribs.—A large quantity of grain is stored, awaiting higher prices. This may be wise or otherwise. One thing to be considered is the loss by shrinkage and wastes in the granary and crib. Wheat in the granary is subject to injury by the weevil and the grain moth. This damage may be prevented to some extent by shifting the grain and running it through the fanning-mill. Corn cribs are almost always infested by rats and mice. A vermin-proof crib may be made by covering the posts and lower corners with tin or sheet-iron, which may be painted for preservation. The loss by these causes will average 18 per cent., and often more, of the value of the grain, but it may be in part or wholly avoided by care and precaution.

Ice Ponds.—Every house and dairy, however small the latter may be, should have a supply of ice. If there is no pond, a small stream may be dammed and the water backed up, to make a pond. A considerable supply may be procured by making of boards a large box a foot deep, similar to a mortar bed, and claying the joints. If this is filled with water, in cold weather, an exposure of two or three days will be sufficient to make a cake of ice, which may be put up in this shape with little trouble. A large block of ice has been made in the house itself, by making a frame of boards in the center, and gradually filling it up, so that the water freezes solidly each night. Additions in height are made to the frame as required, and the sawdust is packed around it. In this way a solid block of ice, ten feet each way, weighing over thirty tons, has been made during the winter by means of a hose from a pump. Such a block of ice wastes very little in the summer.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

Thin Gingerbread.—Boil one quart molasses twenty minutes; add immediately one table-spoonful soda, one cup of butter, ginger to taste, flour to make a paste to roll.

Cup Cake.—A cup and a half of sugar, half cup each of milk and butter, three eggs, a little over two cups of flour, a cup of currants, teaspoonful cream tartar, half teaspoonful soda; spice with nutmeg, as you prefer.

Cranberry Dumpling.—One quart of flour, one teaspoonful of soda, and two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar, sifted together; mix into a soft dough with sweet milk; roll the dough out very thin in oblong shapes, and spread over it one quart of cranberries, picked and washed clean; add half a pound of sugar, sprinkled evenly; fold over and over, then tie in a pudding-cloth and put into a steamer, where let it cook over a steady fire for one hour, with faith, never looking into the pot. Serve with sweet wine sauce.

Graham Bread.—Take one cake of dry yeast, such as you get at the grocer's—I like it better than the compressed yeast—dissolve in a cupful of warm water, and make a batter of wheat flour in a bowl, about 4 o'clock, and set in a warm place until evening; then take one quart warm water, large spoonful of salt, and make your batter or sponge, also with wheat flour, and cover in a warm place until morning; then put in two table-spoonfuls of molasses, and make up your dough with your hands with Graham flour; now stand again to rise until light, when it is to be made into loaves and let stand until very light, and bake.

French Pancakes.—Ingredients: Two eggs, one-half pint milk, two ounces granulated sugar, two ounces butter, flour and jelly. (1) Beat the butter and sugar to a cream; (2) beat the eggs separately, the yelks to a cream, and the whites to a froth, and add the yelks to the butter and sugar; (3) stir the milk into these ingredients; (4) butter six tin pie plates; (5) sift two ounces of flour with a teaspoonful of baking powder, and stir it quickly into the above-named mixture, with the whites of the eggs; put the butter quickly upon the buttered plates, and bake the pancakes brown in a quick oven; (6) dust them with powdered sugar, lay them one over the other, with a little jelly between; dust the top with sugar, and serve them hot.

Corn Muffins.—Take one quart of milk and let it come to a boiling heat, but do not let it boil; then let it stand until lukewarm; then stir in two cups of yellow Indian meal and one of flour; make this about as thick as sponge for bread; dissolve a small cake of compressed yeast and add to it; let this stand for one hour to rise; in that time it will be very light; then add one heaping table-spoonful of powdered sugar, two well-beaten eggs, one-half cup of melted butter, one-half teaspoonful of soda; stir this well together, and have the muffin-rings hot and well greased with good butter, as poor would give the muffin a disagreeable taste; let them stand for fifteen minutes; then put in a moderate oven to bake; it will require one-half hour to bake them. This receipt makes two dozen of muffins.

Starvation in Germany.

The failure of the potato crop in Europe will nowhere cause greater hardship than in some parts of Germany. Last spring the German newspapers were full of startling descriptions of people suffering for want of food in the forest region of Spessart. While the Government was expending enormous sums upon fortifications and soldiery, official investigations revealed the fact that over three-fourths of all the inhabitants of the Spessart district were in pitiable destitution. A leading journal of Germany said of this impoverished population: "They are barely able to maintain a wretched existence from one potato crop to the other, and a single failure of this crop reduces them to the most abject want, even in times when there is no such general industrial depression as at present exists." A commission, directed by the Government to examine into the correctness of the newspaper reports, found in the habitations of this impoverished population "no bread, no potatoes, no salt. It was a population on whose faces the shadow of starvation lowered, and who brooded in speechless distress, their courage gone, and already too weak to work." In one village it was reported that wild hogs that had been buried were dug up and eaten. Greater than even this and more widely diffused must the suffering be during the coming year, unless means of relief are promptly provided.

Hawesville, Ky., brags of a man who doesn't care for dogs at all when he's sober, but, when he's drunk, has a mania to own all the dogs in the country. He will ask a neighbor to give him his dog. If he won't give it, the man tries to buy it; if the other won't sell it, the first steals it. He has thus been known to collect 150 dogs in a week's spree, and feeds them liberally till he gets sober.

SOME OLD BOOMS.

The Harrison Hurricane of 1840—How Henry Clay Was Beaten.

[From the Springfield Republican.]

Nearly forty years ago the famine of '37 had started a tidal wave in American politics which took shape as a Harrison boom. The country had been Democratic so long, the supremacy of the Jackson machine had been so unquestioned, that Martin Van Buren at Washington expected his re-election as serenely in 1840 as he had awaited the result in 1836, when Jackson named him as his successor, and the unanimous nomination of the Democratic Convention at Baltimore in 1835 was equivalent to an election. Van Buren was buried out of sight. Harrison had a larger majority than any candidate received again till Abraham Lincoln was re-elected in 1864, and the vote in the Electoral College stood almost four to one in favor of the Whig candidate. A Whig House was elected with Harrison, and for the first time in the history of the party a Whig became Speaker. The House swung back in 1842 and elected a Democrat as Speaker, but the Senate remained a Whig body in spite of Harrison's death and Tyler's defection. The current continued to run with the Whigs. It was early plain that Tyler's split amounted to nothing. In the States the Whigs barely held their ground, and they lost New York, then as now the pivotal State of the Union, through a division in the opposition to the Locofoco candidate.

The folly of the Democratic majority in Congress changed matters. The prospect of the annexation of Texas roused the jealousy of the North. Congressional meddling with the tariff shook the allegiance of Pennsylvania. The canvass for 1844 opened with a Clay boom that swept the country, and when the Democrats nominated James K. Polk, a man little known, without a record and whose utterances "for the public eye" carefully concealed his sentiments on protection, Whig success seemed certain. Unfortunately the Whig leaders failed to understand that their best hope of success lay not in nominating the man with the biggest boom, but with the best principles. Blinded by the shout of the day, the great crowd that made every trip of Clay's a triumphal progress, they forgot the small, earnest body of men who were determined to vote for a man right on the slavery question or not to vote at all. The Whig leaders, Horace Greeley among them, insisted on regarding the little knot of earnest men who fought Clay for his record on the slavery question as a pack of enthusiasts who would fall into line when the time came. Between Clay, right on most questions and wrong on one, and Polk, wrong on all, it did not seem possible that earnest voters could hesitate. The Liberty party for six years had cast so small a vote, its prospects were so absolutely hopeless, that the politicians looked to see them dissolve and pass into the Whig ranks, in order to ward off the Southern danger of the day, the annexation of Texas.

The Liberty party did nothing of the sort. The mere handful of earnest men in its ranks, one here and one there, organized in a useless contest. They determined to vote right and let the consequences of a conscience-vote take care of themselves. James G. Birney was put up again to lead a forlorn hope. The skeleton organization of his party was the derision of the country. The election of 1844 came, and the votes were counted. A Birney electoral ticket was run in but thirteen States, he polled but 62,300 votes in all, barely 2 per cent. of the popular vote, but he polled them in the right places to beat Clay! In New York Birney had 15,812 votes, say two-thirds the strength of the New York scratchers to-day, but Birney's vote gave the State and thirty-six electoral votes to Polk. In Michigan Birney polled 3,632 votes, but that was enough to leave Clay in a minority, and Polk picked up five electoral votes in Michigan. But for the 2,106 votes the Liberty party had in Indiana, the Whig candidate would have probably carried that State and twelve electoral votes there, but this was not necessary. New York and Michigan would have elected Clay if it had not been for the Liberty party. "James K. Polk," wrote Greeley, in sorrow over the defeat of his loved leader, "owes his election to the Birney or Liberty party."

It takes amazingly few votes to break a big boom, if they are cast in doubtful States. The Whigs of 1844 went through an election to find this out; the politicians of to-day will do well to learn the lesson before the next election.

Health of Horses.

The health and comfort of horses have of late years been greatly improved by the better construction of stables. They are made more roomy and lofty, and provided with means of thorough ventilation. In many new stables lofts are done away with, or the floor of the lofts is kept well above the horses' heads, and ample shafts are introduced to convey away foul air. By perforated bricks and gratings under the mangers and elsewhere round the walls, and also by bay windows and ventilators, abundance of pure air is secured for the horses; while, being introduced in moderate amount and from various directions, it comes in without draught. Too much draught is almost an unknown stable luxury. To secure a constant supply of pure air, horses require more cubic space than they generally enjoy. Even when animals are stabled only at night, a minimum of 1,200 cubic feet should be allowed. In England, the newer cavalry barracks give a minimum of 1,500 feet, with a ground area of fully ninety square feet per horse, and the best hunting and carriage horses have more room.—Journal of Chemistry.

His Name Was Smith.

In the grammar department of one of our public schools, a few days since, the teacher, after talking with her class on the subject of mythology, read to them as follows:

"Vulcan, smith, architect and chariot-builder for the gods of Mount Olympus, built their houses, constructed their furniture," etc.

The following day the subject of the preceding day was given as a language-lesson, and, as no mention was made of Vulcan, the teacher asked the class who built the houses for the gods on Mount Olympus? For a while the children seem lost in profound thought, when suddenly a gleam of intelligence illumined the face of one little girl, and she replied:

"I can't think of his first name, but his last name is Smith!"—Boston Transcript.

Negligence to pay up newspaper subscriptions amounts in the long run to nothing short of an unremitting effort to starve out the country editor.

The finest monument in the far West is about to be placed over the grave of Mr. John Iliff, the cattle king, at Denver, Col. The cost is $15,000.

A radical English paper lately offered a prize of two guineas for the best possible English Liberal Cabinet. There were 700 competitors; 350 gave the Premiership to Mr. Gladstone, 250 to Lord Hartington, and 94 to Lord Granville.

The fifth volume of the "Parliamentary Discourses of M. Thiers" brings him down to the year 1841. The last two volumes contain the speeches from 1837 to 1841. At this rate it will be seen that Thiers' speeches, brought to the date of his death, will form a library in themselves, which only a resolute reader will ever wade through.

It is now proposed in Paris to substitute for the dispatch of letters miniature railroads, with trains run by electricity, in place of pneumatic tubes. Satisfactory experiments have been made. The pneumatic plan has long been in use by the London postoffice, but does not seem to have found favor in this country.

A very beautiful lady who was hurrying through the streets of Baltimore turned and in pathetic accents asked a gentleman walking beside her to knock a pickpocket down who was following her. The gentleman obligingly complied. As soon as she saw the fight fairly begun she chuckled gayly and skipped away. The man knocked down was her husband.

Statesmen have often ratted before now in one sense, but it has been reserved for Viscount Cranbrook, as Secretary for India, to go a ratting in another fashion. The Indian Government gives rewards for rats, whose skins have hitherto been thrown away, but Lord Lytton, inheriting no doubt the economic qualities of his father, has consigned a cargo to the Indian Office, London, and they are sold by Lord Cranbrook.

A writer in the Mark Lane Express, the leading London agricultural journal, says: "The Times is now following Lord Beaconsfield's lead in puffing the Canada Northwest. Well, if people are prepared to encounter a winter of from five to six months and a temperature that for three months is, on an average, below zero, no doubt they will find good wheat land to cultivate. To my mind the severity of the climate is sufficient to raise the question whether life is worth living in the 'illimitable and fertile wilderness.'"

A long time ago, in Mason county Ky., an old toper agreed to fight a ferocious ram, the prize being a quart of whisky. The whole village collected to see the fight. Both man and ram charged at the same time, but the man quickly righted, and, planting his foot upon the lifeless carcass of his foe, demanded and drank the whisky. Just at the moment of collision th man had dropped his head, and the nose, of the ram coming in contact with the elevated shoulders, the animal's neck was broken.

Vesuvius is not as it used to be, and presents a very striking aspect at present. Around the great cone three craters launch steam and incandescent lava, which loses itself in the deep valley between Vesuvius and Mount Somma. At the end of October two small craters opened, blowing off portions of the mountain which obstructed the issue of lava. This is flowing slowly in a northeasterly direction, as is visible to the naked eye from Naples. In spite of the smoke, showers of pumice stone, scoria, and red ashes, curious visitors do not hesitate to approach the edge of the crater. The heat is bearable there at a distance twenty-five to thirty meters.

Alaska Winters.

In winter, from what I can learn, the storms are mostly rain, at a temperature of 35 or 40 degrees, and strong winds, which, when they sweep the channels lengthwise, lash them into waves, and carry the salt scud far into the woods. The long nights are then gloomy enough to most people, and the value of a snug home, with blazing, crackling, yellow-cedar fire, and book-covered tables, may be finely appreciated. Snow falls quite frequently, but never to any great depth, or to lie long. Only once, since the settlement of Fort Wrangel, the ground was covered to the depth of four feet. The ordinary depth anywhere near sea-level is said to be a sloppy condition. The mercury seldom falls more than 5 or 6 degrees below the freezing point, unless the wind blows steadily from the mainland. Back from the coast, however, beyond the mountains, the winter months are intensely cold. At Glenora, on the Stickene river, less than 1,000 feet above the level of the sea, a temperature of from 30 to 40 degrees below zero is not uncommon.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, DEC. 18, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY
EDITORS.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,

Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

"NO SOLID SOUTH, NO SOLID NORTH, BUT A SOLID UNION."

Geo. Hazzard is now in jail at Indianapolis playing lunatic. He has six attorneys employed to defend him.

Washington City is to have a new paper in the interests of the army and navy. It is to be called the "Army and Navy Gazette."

$32,404,000 appropriated by congress to pay pensions, will certainly give John Sherman an opportunity to get rid of his surplus silver.

The medical college of Indiana will be well supplied with "stiffs" during the winter. Frozen niggers from North Carolina will overstock the market.

The address of W. L. Penfield, which appears on the first page of this paper, is worthy of a careful reading by all lovers of eloquence and fine sentiment.

A copy of The Shelby Democrat, marked "X," just received, presents a very attractive appearance, besides being very ably edited. We gladly place it on our exchange list.

It has been decided in the supreme court of this state, that the section of the liquor law requiring saloons to close at 11 o'clock p. m. has been repealed. Saloons can now be kept open day and night.

The Indianapolis Sentinel has this to say of a DeKalb county man who attended the Grant reception:

"Captain J. D. Likens, of Auburn, was publicly complimented as the best-drilled officer of the best-drilled company in the city."

The London (England) Times, in reviewing the American presidential field, says that "the re-election of Grant would be hailed with the liveliest satisfaction by the people of England." Certainly. Why not? England would rejoice to see America governed by a king.

The last rail on the Cincinnati Southern railroad was put down a few days since, connecting Cincinnati with Chattanoogo, the entire length of the road being 336 miles. The completion of the Southern road will be of great advantage to the people of Ohio and Indiana.

The North Carolina negroes are still coming to Indiana in destitute circumstances, and white laboring men are expected to help support them during the winter, and in the spring step aside and allow the lazy negroes to their take places, all for the sake of making Indiana a republican state.

A movement is on foot in the United States senate to withhold the pay of Senator Sharon, who was absent during the entire extra session of congress, and a greater portion of the time during the last regular session. This is a move in the right direction, and will probably induce members of congress to be more punctual hereafter.

Almost every day a squad of from 25 to 100 pauper negroes arrive in Indiana from North Carolina. They manage to get as far as Washington City, when they are taken in charge by the republican exodus committee. Funds are raised by donation to forward the women and children, but the men have to walk and work their way to Indiana.

The Island Park Assembly Journal, Vol. 1. No. 1, is before us. It is an eight page paper, devoted to religion and Sunday-school work. Issued monthly at Lagrange, Ind. Edited by Rev. A. H. Gillet, A. M., and published by John H. Rerick, editor and publisher of the Lagrange Standard. Every Sunday-school worker should subscribe for it.

A correspondent of the Indianapolis Sentinel, writing from Anderson, says that Major Ed. Henderson is spoken of as a candidate for auditor of state on the democratic ticket, and suggests that "he is largely identified with the business interest of that city and county, and has hosts of friends who will, at the proper time, urge his claims." For the information of his "hosts of friends," we must be permitted to remark that Mr. Henderson is too closely identified with the Hazzard business to get any votes in this part of the state.

A TERRIBLE EXPLOSION.

Five Men and a Saw Mill Torn to Pieces.

On the afternoon of Tuesday last, a terrible explosion occurred at Turnbull's saw-mill, near Collins station, on the Logansport and Butler division of the Wabash railway. The employes on the mill were Mr. Turnbull, his two sons, a nephew and a man named Glenn, every one of whom were instantly killed, their bodies being torn to pieces and scattered in all directions; hands, arms and legs being promiscuously mixed with the fragments of the building. The disaster has cast a gloom over the entire community.

EDUCATIONAL COLUMN.

By Prof. W. H. MacIntosh.

CLASSES AND CLASS-WORK.

Great diversity exists in our schools in respect to the number of classes and the methods of hearing recitations. It is evident that time is lost in moving to and from seats, and in giving individual instruction. The remedy is longer and less frequent recitations and larger classes. This can be applied by giving smaller children slate work in printing lessons, writing numbers and words to be spelled, and in securing uniformity in text books.

In response to mistaken popular desire, many teachers make a merit of calling out the primer and first-reader classes four times per day, and going through with a brief, profitless routine.

There is little learned, and that is speedily forgotten. The custom is akin to giving children frequent lunches, and they are thereby disqualified for a full meal. Small children need time and skillful instruction, and two lessons, of from five to seven minutes each, are worth more than four in number, of two or three minutes each.

The schools of DeKalb, so far as visited, show a great difference as regards the adoption of modern text books. Perhaps it would be unjust to say that progressive parents promptly supplied their children with text books required by the board of education, while those indifferent refused to purchase them on account of "the old ones being good enough for their children," but it is a fact that the measure of our teachers' usefulness this winter is diminished by the presence in schools of antiquated books.

Education makes citizens more valuable, and improves the kind and quantity of their labor. It costs this county many thousands of dollars annually, and self interest unites with public welfare in supplying the tools of the profession of teaching to the district schoolmaster.

As the farmer would not place in the hands of his hired man a dull axe to use in cutting cordwood, neither should he place in his children's hands books grown useless as compared with others. There is little consistency in buying reapers and buggy-rakes and cultivators to farm an eighty-acre lot, and in refusing to purchase for one's own children, at the cost of a dollar or two, the books needed to enable the toiling and meritorious teacher to advance them as thoroughly and as rapidly as he desires.

Teachers are earnest and enthusiastic in vain if the parents fail to give them hearty support. No teacher can succeed when patrons are opposed to him, and no teacher of spirit would try. The people do and should rule, and progress is measured by their assistance. Have not schools been "run" with a closing attendance of less than half a dozen pupils? Is parental control so weakened that it may truthfully be said that children attend school only at their own pleasure? The faults of irregularity and non-attendance lie at parents' doors, and children are gladdened when father buys the new book which places them in class with their mental equals.

In many of our district schools, the parents deserve credit for their interest in school-work. If an estimate may be made of the commendable zeal shown through the county, by the observed attention to education in the townships of Jackson, Richland and Keyser, the result must be very gratifying. The diversity of authors in the same school is rapidly giving place to a single author in each branch of study. In proportion as this is done, valuable time is saved for the teacher, and efficiency of instruction is obtained.

The rigor of examination has given rise in some quarters to the opinion that teachers are generally incompetent, and are lacking in qualifications; but it is gratifying to be able to state that our schools are mainly being conducted by energetic and thorough persons. Give them larger classes and more time, and note the result.

It is proof of efficient teaching in country schools, that many pupils from them, on entering our town graded schools, exhibit valuable habits of study, and make quite as good proficiency as those they find there who have had better facilities and longer drill. Those country pupils not unfrequently stand above the average, and sometimes lead their classes. Many schools have too few pupils to admit good classifications or to obtain any emulative competition, and there is no remedy but the formation of larger districts. DeKalb county contains a great many school houses, but some of them are hardly deserving of an honorable name. The children had better go farther from home and be seated in rooms admitting of class recitations.

Scholars are individuals and must be so regarded, but they must be taught by system, giving each branch due attention. Merchants speak of their goods as "stock," and move them as if all were composed of one article. Lawyers have many difficult cases, but they attend to but one at a time in regular succession, and the teacher must classify closely to secure order and progress.

Class-work requires the entire attention. Children should never, unless for urgent reasons, be permitted to interrupt the teacher, and he should stop a recitation when he is compelled to attend to disorder, to ventilation and heating. To instruct a class takes ideas, language and uninterrupted attention. Other exercises of school prepare for work in classes. Good morals are taught by precept, behavior by repression and example; but teaching is the actual business of the schoolmaster.

Each class should have its specified time, to be determined by the study and its relations to other branches, and no one can encroach upon another without the practice becoming ruinous to the discipline of a school.

If a teacher is habitually behind time in hearing classes and has a small clock, he may appoint a steady pupil to observe the programme and give signals for dismission of pupils. Teacher and school will soon feel the beneficial effect of the plan. Children more readily submit to restrictions when they see their preceptor likewise willingly subjecting himself to the same laws.

The prime idea of common schools was to teach all to read, write and cipher, and many intelligent friends of education think that these studies only should be taught in district schools. They think that if the children become good readers, writers and calculators, that they have the real foundations of learning, and the means of farther, and to a great extent, independent progress.

In some schools two or three large pupils studying physiology, history and elocution, take up the teacher's time to the neglect of the great body of the school, and this is manifestly unjust to the patrons of the school who, having equal interest, should have proportionate time.

There are teachers who, on being asked how many of their school study arithmetic, have answered, "all." This is as it should be. He is really a teacher who lays out his strength in advancing as rapidly and thoroughly as he can his entire school. Far better this, than the most interesting recitations of the two or three in the subsidiary branches above named.

The problem of how to act on numbers by arrangement and classification, is worthy of solution. Twenty may hear and profit by an explanation as well as one, and by twenty is the teacher's power multiplied.

Always remember that time devoted to classes of two or three is a loss of a large part of labor, and just so far as a uniformity of text books and close classification can be obtained, to the same extent may parents expect to see their children making pleasant and thorough progress.

Township Institute.

A meeting of the teachers of Keyser and Butler townships took place at Garrett, Saturday, December 13, for the purpose of comparing methods and taking advantage of mutual experience.

Among the points considered were the following: All time should not be given to recitation; some attention bestowed to observing behavior and securing study is well employed. The interest of any common school requires that there be no classes in reading higher than fifth-reader, and more will be learned by pupils where they aid teachers in this regard. Advanced pupils should not receive more than their proportion of time.

The order of studies is not material, provided there is an interval for study between recitations.

No one study should be made prominent, but all the enthusiasm and interest of the teacher should be shifted from class to class and from study to study.

The brief afternoon session was given to an expression of views on government, the particular subject being "whispering." None thought it could be entirely suppressed. Some allowed the practice just so far as it does not disturb teachers. C. P. Houser stated a good principle, viz: "What is right for one is right for all." The superintendent expressed himself in favor of repressing whispering, or creating a sentiment against it, and by authority. Order and good behavior are as valuable as hearing classes. Trustees Clark and Broughton were present, and took active part in the meeting, as did all teachers present, among whom were Messrs. C. M. and T. Merica, Kelham, Saxton, Conrad and Dugan, and Misses Zeigler and Moody.

The Indiana Farmer.

This large 48-column Weekly Agricultural and Farm Journal stands at the head of the agricultural press of the west, leading them all in circulation. It is eminently practical in all its features, and numbers among its writers and contributors, scores of the best practical farmers and agriculturists of America. It presents all of its yearly subscribers for 1880 with a copy of Prof. Tice's National Weather Forecast and American Almanac for 1880. This book has a wide reputation for accuracy in forecasting the weather every day in the year, and contains much other valuable scientific matter. Every farmer needs this book, and as an agricultural journal the FARMER leads them all. Both are sent to subscribers for $1.60, lowest club rate.

If there is no agent near you, address INDIANA FARMER, Indianapolis, Ind.

St. Joe.

—The mud blockade is broken, and in consequence everybody smiles.

—Solomon is still engaged in the hog business, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather.

—Mort. Olds, the champion bologna-sausage slinger, is still in town. He will have several thousand yards on hand in a few days.

—It is proposed to have a Christmas-tree, next Wednesday evening, for the benefit of the Sabbath-school. The distribution of presents, declamations, singing by the choir, and other amusements will be the order of the evening.

—We understand that an oyster-supper will be given Christmas eve, the proceeds of which will swell the finances of the new church which is now nearly completed. The ladies of the church, of course, are the prime movers in the enterprise.

—A young man from Newville made a raid on the millinery establishment at this place, Thursday, Dec. 4, and succeeded in burglarizing the whole outfit—millinery goods, milliner and all. It is rumored, however, that the milliner offered but little resistance, and that both she and the goods are secreted on the farm of James Hamilton.

—Tommy Abels now occupies the residence of Miss Maxwell, the late milliner of this place.

Pause, Ponder and Peruse!

The invention of that Superior and Complete Sewing Machine (The Family Sewing Machine), marks one of the most important eras in the history of machinery and when we consider its great usefulness and extremely low price ($25), it is very difficult to conceive of any invention for domestic use of more or even equal importance to families. It has great capacity for work; beautiful, smooth, and quiet movement, rapid execution, certainty and delightful ease of operation, that at once commends it above all others The working parts are all steel, strong and durable, and will last a life time; the bobbins hold 100 yards of thread; the stitch is the firmest of all the stitches made, neat and regular, and can be regulated in a moment to sew stitches from an inch in length on coarse material down to the finest, so infintesimal as to be hardly discernable with the naked eye, and with a rapidity rendering it impossible to count them as fast as made; it has more attachments than any other, and it does to perfection all kinds of heavy, coarse, plain, fine, or fancy needle-work with ease, and far less labor than required on other machines. It needs no commendation, the rapid sales, increasing demand and voluntary encomiums from the press, and the thousands of families who use them, amply testify to their undoubted worth as a standard and reliable household necessity, extending its popularity each day. Machines sent anywhere to be examined before any money is paid. Agents wanted by the Company, Address them for information. Family Sewing Machine Co., 755 Broadway, New York. 43-1y.

—Harry Yesbera and Fred. Clark made a business trip—a strictly business trip—to Ft. Wayne last Friday. The former went after some masquerade suits, and the latter went after some railroad.

—The little Ethiopian who was sent to the poor-house for larceny, a short time ago, amused himself Tuesday by trying to burn up beds and fire the building. He is kept in shackles all the time, and is altogether a cuss.

—Georgie P. Smith has gone to Detroit; he went Tuesday noon. Georgie is the corpulent, good-natured infant who does heaps of work at the junction, as Freddie Clark's right bower. Just as soon as he plays the string out he will return.

—Willis & Co. have filled their store full and running over with holiday goods. Toys and notions of every description, and enough for all. Call early and make your selections, and avoid the rush incident to the day before christmas. 50-2w.

—Mr. S. Claus, the antiquated old gent whom the juveniles hanker for, is expected in Auburn early Thursbay morning. Be a good little Sunday-school boy, don't use cuss words, and say your prayers every night for at least the coming six nights. No angel, no peanuts.

—Ensley & Co., east of the public square, have just received a large invoice of ladies dress goods and trimmings; also, a full line of notions and fancy goods for the holidays, making the most complete stock in the county to select from. Don't fail to go there for your holiday goods. 50-2w.

—The St. Charles bridge, recently damaged by the rise of water in the Missouri river, has been completely reconstructed. All trains on the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific railway are now running through between St. Louis and the northern terminus, without change or delay.

—J. M. Gossage and W. E. Eldridge, for some time past typos in this establishment, severed their connection with the office last Saturday. They are both steady fellows and general favorites among their social companions, and their future prosperity will be noted with interest by the Courier.

—The Courier editors acknowledge the receipt of invitations to a grand masquerade ball to be held at Columbia City, Tuesday evening, December 30, under the auspices of the hook-and-ladder company. The invitation committee consists of Messrs. W. H. H. Rutter, E. L. McLallen, D. L. Worth, Jas. E. McDonald and Chas. R. Huffman, which of itself is enough to insure the presence of a large number of heel-and-toe manipulators and the success of the entertainment.

—How plainly the hog instinct sticks out of some of us. This idea was inspired by the action of a man on the Saginaw train, a day or two since, who ignored the presence of a boy selling chestnuts until he found that he could get two glasses for a nickel, when he immediately purchased twice as many as he could eat.

—The Auburn Daily News, under the control of Johnnie and Pete (Gossage and Eldridge), ex-employes of the Courier office, will make its first appearance next Saturday. While we hope the boys will achieve all they may have anticipated and acquire both riches and glory, we are inclined to believe they will find it decidedly up-hill business.

—Invitations are now out for the big Christmas ball—a masquerade—which will hold forth at Ensley hall next Thursday night, Dec. 25. It will far excel all past efforts of the Neoteric club, and more fun will be "on tap" for that one evening than can be found elsewhere in four months. Tickets, per couple, 75 cents for the dance and 75 cents for supper at the Hotel Swineford.

—Will. H. Covey, with whom the junior of this paper was for two years associated as an employe in the office of the Bentonville (Arkansas) Advance, arrived in Auburn last Thursday, and is now a type-slinger on the Courier force. His whole life has been spent in the "sunny south," though he thinks he can stand the winter racket if Santa Claus can.

—About as fine an opportunity as any we know of for a man to display his true inwardness, as regards the amount of obstinacy and muleishness he contains to the square inch, is presented, we think, in a ball room. He there has a chance to exhibit his ignorance of the first principles of common courtesy, and others can easily determine as to whether or not he has been accustomed to the manners of a true gentleman.

—The People's Library has been placed in the hands of the librarian, and the members of the association are now receiving the benefits. The library consists of one hundred volumes, being an average of two for each member. The number of books will be increased as the number of membership increases, and with careful management a large and valuable collection of books will be secured with little expense.

—The young ladies of this city met at the Baptist church last Sunday afternoon and organized an association to be known as The Auburn Young Ladies Christian Temperance Union. The following named persons were elected officers: President, Miss Alice R. McKay; vice-president, Mrs. F. P. Copper; Secretary, Miss Mary Pitcher; Treasurer, Miss Mary Cleveland. The first regular meeting will be held at the residence of Mrs. Geo. Stahl, one week from next Sunday, at 3 o'clock p. m. Regular meetings will be held at private residences every two weeks, until a hall can be secured.

—The Auburn Historical Society met at the soldiers hall on Friday evening, Dec. 5th, and elected the following officers for the ensuing year: President, E. L. Casebeer; vice-president, A. Kinmont; secretary, Mrs. D. J. Swartz; treasurer, E. Zimmerman, librarian, G. W. Gordon; executive committee, R. Elson, E. Ashley and E. D. Hartman. The next meeting of the society will be held on Friday evening of this week, at the soldiers hall. It is hoped that all subscribers to the library fund, and others who intend to become members of the society, will be present, as important business connected with the organization will be transacted at the time.

Mrs. D. J. Swartz, Sec'y.

Bryan, Ohio, And its Den of Thieves.

After shadowing for two weeks, the worst nest of thieves and blacklegs that ever infested any town, Deputy Sheriff John C. Somers of this county, assisted by Sheriff Geo. C. Kober, of Williams county, Ohio, succeeded in arresting and confining in our jail two of the burglars and would-be murderers of Mr. Sol. Barney and family, of Spencerville, an account of which was given in the Courier. We have the full particulars of the arrest, and the means used to bring it about, but we are not at liberty, nor do we deem it good policy to give full details at present. The parties arrested are George Stover, late of the Auburn, (N. Y.) penitentiary, and Alex. McDonald, alias Wm. Jackson, recently from the Ohio state prison.

Deputy Somers and others of this county are at a loss to find words to express their praise of Sheriff Kober of Williams county, for his skill, willingness, exertion and arduous labor to secure the gang of which the captives are the ring-leaders.

The citizens of Willaims county can well be proud of their sheriff for skill, bravery and gentlemanly conduct.

As heretofore reported by us, it was supposed that one of the burglars was shot by the plucky little wife of Mr. Barney. This proves to be true, and Mrs. Barney has had the pleasure of again handling the little missile which in all probability saved the lives of her husband, herself and little family, for the ball was extracted from McDonald's arm since his arrest. For Mrs. Barney's bravery the citizens of Bryan presented her with a neat little twenty dollar "shooting iron," requesting her to use it with more deadly effect should a similar occasion present itself.

Also, $1 for one dog, $2 for each female dog, and $2 for each additional dog, for the collection of which I may be found at the county treasurer's office, in the town of Auburn, on and after December 15th, 1879.

Taxes may be paid in full or in two installments. The first installment including all road taxes, can be paid on or before the third Monday in April, 1880; the second installment on or before the first Monday in November, 1880. If the first installment is not paid when due, both installments become delinquent, ten per cent. will be added, and I shall at once proceed, as the law requires, to collect the same, together with the costs that may accrue, by distress and sale of personal property.

Road receipts will not be received after the third Monday in April, only on delinquent taxes. No road receipts will be received on the November installment.

Examine your receipts before leaving the office, and see that all your property is included.

No county order will be paid to any person owing delinquent taxes.

The annual sale of lands and lots for delinquent taxes will occur on the second Monday in February, 1880.

Come early and avoid the rush of the last few days.

The books will positively be closed on the evening of the third Monday in April, and no one will be allowed to pay after that date without penalty.

Parties sending by others, or by letter, to pay tax, should not fail to send description of their lands and lots.

No receipt will be made out hereafter, for any party, until they are ready to pay for the same.

Auburn, Ind., Dec. 15, 1879. DANIEL GONSER, Treasurer of DeKalb County.

THE TALE OF A TURKEY.

A Tough Story.

A turkey for my Christmas feast I started out to buy—
The best one in the market to obtain I meant to try;
Thought I, it shall not be my fault if in the town there be
A better turkey than the one that shall be brought to me.

I at a corner stopped as up the street I took my way,
Where on a stand there, improvised, a single turkey lay.
My look of inquiry at once the watchful dealer caught,
And, coming forth, a customer to make of me he sought.

"Come, let me sell you that," said he, with smiles upon his face;
"A better one I know you cannot find in all the place;
Of all the stock of turkeys that I brought to town with me,
I purchasers have found for all except the one you see.

And, if I can dispose of it, this one the fiftieth makes—
They took so with the people that they went off like hot cakes;
And it is not three hours quite since my sales began.
Would you believe it, sir? I sold four turkeys to one man.

"Now, as I really do not care that single one to keep,
And, wishing soon to start for home, I'll sell it to you cheap."
Quite taken with the man's address, I credulously heard
All that he said to me about that solitary bird.

The turkey was a large one, and in truth looked plump enough;
Moreover, how was I to know that all he said was stuff?
So, laying down the needful stamps, I brought my fowl away—
Truly a foul transaction was the one that marked that day.

How little thought I, as toward my domicile I strolled,
That not alone the turkey but its purchaser was sold,
And that the smiling man, whose face seemed stamped with honesty,
Was an outrageous swindler, and had made a goose of me!

But to resume my narrative: I took the turkey home,
And to my Christmas-dinner I invited friends to come;
Requested of my kitchen-maids to have it nicely done,
And to prepare it so that it should be excelled by none.

On Christmas day my friends and I assembled at my board,
Which teemed with all the luxuries the market could afford;
The dishes, filled with delicacies, made a grand array—
To crown the pleasing picture, in the midst the turkey lay.

It would have done you good could it have been your lot to see
The pleasurable visages of that gay company;
Each smacked his lips, while expectation beamed in every face—
A pious friend then present even said for us a grace.

To say a grace o'er such a fowl was a disgrace and shame;
True, it was innocently done—our friend was not to blame.
Could he have known it was a fraud, as afterward he knew,
He would not have allowed himself so mean a thing to do.

"Well, then, "the brother," in good faith, complied with my request—
Over that bird he said a grace with fervor and with zest;
And it was rendered gracefully, and nicely worded, too,
And, much impressed, we all "gave ear" until he had got through.

Now, all things being ready, with my gleaming knife in hand,
To carve the turkey, at the table's head I took my stand;
That it was somewhat hard to cut misgivings might have caused,
But, thinking that the knife was dull, I helped my guests and paused.

Then to the eating of his share did each himself address.
But in a trice the whole of them showed signs of dire distress;
They could not with that meat between them bring their jaws together,
For oh! that bird was not a whit more tender than whit-leather.

Oh! what a wretched sight was that to see them crunch away,
While each one at his neighbor glared with looks of wild dismay!
They found that fowl for toughness by nothing tough excelled,
And, as they could not chew it, to eschew it were compelled.

The faces of the company reflected their chagrin,
And I—ah! who shall paint the tribulation I was in!—
I stood as though to marble turned, not knowing what to do,
Wishing the floor would open wide and let me tumble through.

There was no helping it, and I had but one course to take—
An awkward explanation I was there compelled to make;
And then, to make the best of an extremely bad affair,
I took my friends to a saloon and ordered turkey there.

A sumptuous Christmas feast was soon upon that table seen;
All hands enjoyed it—champagne flowed—all was again serene;
And each one made a vow that, should he e'er that dealer see,
He'd put a head upon the man that got ahead of me.

CHRISTMAS AT MUD FLAT.

BY LEANDER P. RICHARDSON.

She had been in camp four days. Where she came from, why she came, or who she was, no one could tell. But she was in camp, and had come to stay, there was no doubt. She was quiet, modest and simply clad—three qualities which commended her to the residents of Mud Flat as a change from the ordinary run of females who from time to time invaded the precincts of that classic settlement.

Nor were these the only points which had been noted by the boys. As Andy McCorkle had gallantly handed her from the lower step of his mud-bespattered coach to the portico of the hotel everybody saw that she clung almost convulsively to the little child whose arms were twined about her neck. They observed, also, that her features were pale and bloodless to an extent that was almost pitiful. By that delicate intuition which sometimes exists under the roughest exteriors, the sturdy miners of Mud Flat understood that the strange lady was suffering from mental as well as physical illness. Their sympathy was aroused in her behalf from that instant, and every man in the place immediately constituted himself her champion and friend.

A day later, when she had rented a cabin near the outskirts of town, without disclosing to any one her intentions for the future or the story of the past, their interest was increased, and they began to show their friendship in substantial ways. A great heap of firewood was mysteriously deposited within easy reach the first night. Bags of flour, quantities of coffee and sugar, a whole ham, and a quarter of fresh venison likewise made their appearance from some unexplained source the third morning.

Little was seen of the recipient of these treasures, however. She had only been on the street once, and then only to purchase a few necessary articles. Upon that occasion she met the reverential gaze of a score of loungers, and turned her head away, pretending not to see, when the jovial Bill Carter smuggled a huge package of candy into the child's capacious pocket. But aside from that she had remained hidden from view, and the miners knew as little about her on the fourth day as they had on the first.

The 23d of December was unusually cold, even for that locality. As the frozen moon came up over a distant crag, cutting with chilly hands the dusky gloom, one might have fancied that he had suddenly been transplanted into the Arctic region. The ground was covered with a thin layer of snow, which glistened like burnished silver in the pale light. Here and there along the sides of the gulch giant pines, standing like ghostly sentinels, threw spectral shadows across the white expanse. The roar of Potato creek, wrapped in the icy arms of winter, was subdued to a tiny, muffled trickling. And the wind, gently sighing through the passes, played Æolian melodies among the needles of pine and tassels of hemlock.

In the main apartment of the Magnolia saloon, a party of the boys were sitting around a table, upon which steamed a large bowl, emitting a fragrant and aromatic odor.

"Whoever she mought be," observed a tall and rather angular personage known to his companions as Long Tom Rollins—"whoever she mought be, she's alone, barrin' thet kid, and unpretected besides. She's sickly, too, and orter hev a doctor. This ain't no sort of a place for a—a inverlid," he concluded, hesitatingly, removing his heavy boot from the table, and helping himself to a liberal allowance of the punch. Then, after a pause, he continued, "I wonder what ails the critter, anyhow?"

"A man's at the bottom of it, gentlemen, you hear me," observed Judge Gashwilder from the other side of the table, nodding conviction at each of his hearers in turn. "Take my word for it, there's a man in it, as ther allers is in any deviltry as robs some poor woman's cheek of its bloom and her eye of its light."

The Judge was eloquent at all times. But when his round pate glistened from the effects of good punch and his theme was women, he was thought by the men of Mud Flat to have few equals. Therefore the little party seated around the table were considerably startled when, just as their favorite orator had thrust his right hand into his breast as a preparatory gesture leading to a more extended tribute to the sex, Long Tom Rollins leaned forward and exclaimed:

"See here, old man. How do you know all this?"

For a moment everybody was aghast. Whether they were astonished at the suddenness of the interruption, or at the half-savage tone of the speaker, or whether it occurred to them that the Judge might possibly have so far overstepped the bounds of prudence as to have attempted "pumping" the interesting stranger, may never be known. But it is certain they were astounded into silence. Even Judge Gashwilder was observed to lose his usual presence of mind. For an instant his naturally serene countenance wore an expression which in another would have been mistaken for guilt. If the confidence which the others had always placed in him was a trifle shaken at that instant, it was quickly restored when, after a moment's hesitation, the old gentleman explained his peculiar position.

"You see, gentlemen," he said, gradually resuming the attitude from which he had been surprised by the abrupt speech above quoted, "I was prowlin' round her cabin last night, when all of a sudding I heered voices inside. The door was open a leetle bit, and by standin' where I was I couldn't miss a syllerbul. I will here explain," he continued, thrusting his red bandana handkerchief into his breast, as was his wont wher speaking publicly, "that I was there for the purpose of findin' out, if possible, whether the gal was in need of anything that I could help her to."

"Which accounts," observed a bystander, "for that chicking which was hung up alongside the door when I came by this mornin'."

"I heerd her talkin' with the kid," continued Judge Gashwilder, not noticing the interruption, "and I couldn't help lissennen. As near as I could make out, the talk was like this:

"'When shall we see papa?'

"'Heaven knows, my baby. We have sought him long, and when God is ready He will restore him to us.'

"'Is Crismas comin' soon, mamma?'

"'Yes, baby, darling. But there won't be no presents for my little one this time. We are away from home, and poor. But when we find papa we will go where there are lots of pretty things, and then baby shall have plenty.'"

Here the Judge leaned forward and whispered in a mysterious voice, telling his companions that he had heard the mother repeat to her child the sad story of how her father had gone West four years ago to seek his fortune; how for two years his letters, containing money for her support, had come like rays of sunshine through the clouds; how they had suddenly stopped, and no answers were received to her agonized appeals; how for two more years she had supposed him dead; how, at last, the Postmaster in the little village where she lived had, upon his dying-bed, confessed to having stolen the letters from her husband, so as to get the money they contained, and suppressed her missives to him, for fear of discovery; and how she had started out with her little one to find the lost husband, whom she had last heard from in Mud Flat.

All this the Judge told to the few friends he could trust, speaking in a whisper, lest the precious secret should be passed to others in the room.

"And now," he added, resuming his rhetorical attitude and voice, "I axes you, as gentlemen and representatives of Mud Flat chivalry, shall this gal and her kid, being too poor to have a Christmas of their own—shall they go without it, or not? Remember, gentlemen, that kid is the first one as ever came into this place, and p'raps she's our luck. Let us nurtur her, my friends, and let us show her mother thet we ain't so lost to virtoo an' principle as not to appreciate it when we hev a good woman and a innercent kid among us. Let us give 'em a Christmas. I will now perceed to head the subscription."

So saying, the gallant old man moved the punch bowl to one side, and emptied the contents of his breeches pocket upon the table. Others followed suit, and when the last man had placed his contribution there the pile contained a goodly sum.

"Now, gentlemen, some one of us has got to take that money, ride to Denver, and spend it for 'em. Who shall it be?"

"Let me be your agent," responded a deep bass voice.

Turning, they saw a tall stranger standing near by, who had just entered in time to hear the Judge's call for contributions. One or two in the room recognized him as a miner who had come in from the diggings that afternoon, having found it too cold to work longer in the mountains.

They were inclined to resent the interference of an outsider, and probably would not have heeded his request had he not spoken a second time. Drawing near the table, he said:

"Gentlemen, I was once a married man myself, but my wife, God bless her, is dead. For the love I bear her memory, for the affection I have toward the remembrance of my little one buried with her, I ask you to let me aid in this matter."

The sadness in his voice and face was so sincere, and the utility of sending a man who had "been thar, and knowed what wimmen folks would like," presented itself so favorably to the miners that with but little hesitation they allowed him to do as he wished.

In an hour he was gone, and the settlement was lost in speculation as to what he would bring back for the strange lady and her child.

The morning of Dec. 25 dawned crisp and cold. The fresh, biting air of the mountains raced among the trees right merrily, whisking the snow into little wreaths, and frolicking among the branches with real holiday gayety. It was nearly noon when the stranger rode into camp, loaded with bundles. At the Magnolia he met an eager crowd of miners, who, headed by Judge Gashwilder, were soon on the road to the strange lady's cabin. Arrived there, they felt a sudden hesitation about entering. It was like intruding upon some sacred ground, and they were almost tempted to deposit their bundles upon the threshold and fly.

"You take the stuff," said the Judge to the stranger, "and go in fust. You've bin familiar with wimmen, and know how to handle 'em. We'll wait outside."

But the stranger felt the same hesitation. Perhaps his long absence from feminine society made him bashful. Perhaps a thought of the memory he revered caused him to hold back.

Finally the Judge consented to take the lead, and, doffing his hat, knocked softly. The door was opened by the child, who bade him enter. Beside the fire sat the mother, who rose to meet them. All passed in but the stranger, who stood outside.

"Marm," said the Judge, who somehow had lost his usual ease of speech and gesture, "we—that is, the citizens of Mud Flat—has come to wish you a merry Christmas, and to offer you these few tokings of our respeck an' esteem."

Having thus delivered himself, the old gentleman deposited the bundles on the table, and stood beaming serenely on all his companions. The strange lady, completely overcome by this unexpected kindness, could not find words to reply for a moment. Then, in a broken voice, she said:

"This is a glad moment of my sorrowful life. You are good, kind men, and I know God will repay your generosity to the widow and fatherless. I—"

She stopped suddenly, and stood, with blanched cheeks and distended eyes, staring toward the door. The miners turned and beheld the stranger, who, with a great stride forward, and a cry expressing the wildest joy, caught the woman in his arms.

They stood thus, heart pressed to heart, and lips to lips, for an instant. Then the stranger turned his eyes devoutly toward the ceiling.

"Thank God," he murmured, gently, "the wife I had supposed dead is restored to me."

The miners stole softly away, and left the stranger standing thus, with his arms tenderly twined about the woman of his love, and the little child clinging fondly to his knees.

The air was balmy outside; the sun shone with ineffable sweetness upon the scene; a bluejay screamed his delight from a neighboring tree, and the wind played a joyful tune among the rocks. Christmas had come to Mud Flat.

No Danger.

In a recent lecture, Mr. Richard Proctor, the astronomer, said he was in receipt of many questions, most of which it would require a special lecture to answer. To one, however, he would reply explicitly. He held in his hand a communication inquiring whether the giant planets of the solar system would not come into perihelion within the next few years, causing great perturbation, and possibly serious catastrophe to the earth. It was very true that the giant planets would come into perihelion between the years 1882 and 1886, but there was not the least reason to apprehend that their doing so would be productive of any great terrestrial calamity. Those who feared such a result might safely dismiss their apprehensions; there was no ground for the belief that the earth would be materially affected, as the perturbation in its orbit caused thereby would be very trifling.

"MRS. SMITHERS, how can you sleep? The sun has been up these two hours." "Well, what if it has?" said Smithers. "He goes to bed at dark, while I'm up till after midnight."

AN ARKANSAS CYCLONE.

Rough Experience of a Blacksmith Who Was Blown Sixty Feet.

(From the Fort Smith (Ark.) Independent.)

Mr. Bull, who met with such severe treatment by the cyclone that passed by this place, visited us last Wednesday. From him we receive this additional information:

"I was about 200 yards from my house when I saw it coming. It was in the prairie when I saw it, and looked like black smoke from a large furnace. Its shape was like a funnel, inside it was red as fire, and around this was the black foggy mist. In looking at it I saw large and small timber carried along with it. My attention was attracted by the roaring, and, as it was coming in the direction of my house, I ran to it for the purpose of protecting my family. I put my three little children in a side-room among some corn, and, with Sylvester Bull, was holding the door, and all at once the whole building was crushed to the very ground by large trees being blown against it. It blew me about sixty feet, and when I became conscious I found myself among a lot of timber and logs, and Sylvester was lying by my side dead; his head and whole body were crushed. As I was on my way to the house I looked again at the cyclone when it was about 100 yards away, and saw it lift and carry away a lot of hogs and a cow. The children when found were not more than thirty feet from where I had placed them, but none hurt. My wife was considerably bruised, being blown about sixty yards, among a lot of lumber.

"My sister-in-law was carried about fifty feet and thrown to the ground, her arms and shoulders badly bruised.

"My blacksmith-shop was also blown flat to the ground, my bellows entirely destroyed, all my planes, augers, saws, and chisels were carried off and have not yet been found, with the exception of one saw found one mile from the shop and broken in two pieces. My wagon was torn up badly, the front wheels being about sixty yards from where the wagon stood, lodged against a stump; the hind wheels were both smashed up; the wagon bed has not yet been found excepting a few splinters. All my bedding and wearing apparel was carried off and entirely destroyed. I lost all my provisions.

"Immediately in the rear of the wind came a flood of water, just like a water-spout, appearing to pour as if from a funnel."

The Immoderate Use of Tea.

W. J. Morton, in an article on "Tea," in the Journal of Nervous and Mental Diseases, arrives at the following general conclusions:

1. With tea, as with any potent drug, there is a proper and improper dose.

2. In moderation, tea is a mental and bodily stimulant of a most agreeable nature, followed by no harmful reaction. It produces contentment of mind, allays hunger and bodily weariness, and increases the capacity and the incentive for work.

3. Taken immoderately, it leads to a very serious group of symptoms, such as headache, vertigo, heat and flushings of body, ringing in the ears, mental dullness and confusion, tremulousness, "nervousness," sleeplessness, apprehension of evil, exhaustion of mind and body, with disinclination to mental and physical exertion, increased and irregular action of the heart, increased respiration.

Each of the above symptoms are produced by tea taken in immoderate quantities, irrespective of dyspepsia, or hypochondria, or hyperæmia. The prolonged use of tea produces, additionally, symptoms of these three latter diseases. In short, in immoderate doses, tea has a most injurious effect upon the nervous system.

4. Immoderate tea-drinking, continued for a considerable time, with great certainty produces dyspepsia.

5. The immediate mental symptoms produced by tea are not to be attributed to dyspepsia.

In an experiment upon myself the whole group of symptoms was produced, with no signs of digestive trouble superadded.

6. Tea retards the "waste" or retrograde metamorphosis of tissue, and thereby diminishes the demand for food.

It also diminishes the amount of urine secreted.

7. Many of the symptoms of immoderate tea-drinking are such as may occur without suspicion of tea being their cause; and we find many people taking tea to relieve the very symptoms which its abuse is producing.

Suicide of the Scorpion.

Mr. Allen Thomson in a letter says: While residing many years ago during the summer months at the baths of Lucca, in Italy, in a somewhat damp locality, my informant, together with the rest of the family, was much annoyed by the intrusion of small black scorpions into the house, and their being secreted among the bedclothes, in shoes, and in other articles of dress. It thus became necessary to be constantly on the watch for these troublesome creatures, and to take means for their removal and destruction.

Having been informed by the natives of the place that the scorpion would destroy itself if exposed to a sudden light, my informant and her friends soon became adepts in catching the scorpions and disposing of them in the manner suggested. This consisted in confining the animal under an inverted drinking glass or tumbler, below which a card was inserted when the capture was made, and then, waiting till dark, suddenly bringing the light of a candle near to the glass in which the animal was confined. No sooner was this done than the scorpion invariably showed signs of great excitement, running round and round the interior of the tumbler with reckless velocity for a number of times. This state having lasted for a minute or more, the animal suddenly became quiet, and, turning its tail or the hinder part of its body over its back, brought its recurved sting down upon the middle of the head, and, piercing it quite forcibly, in a few seconds became quite motionless, and, in fact, quite dead. This observation was repeated very frequently; in truth, it was adopted as the best plan of getting rid of the animals, and the young people were in the habit of handling the scorpions with impunity immediately after they were so killed, and of preserving many of them as curiosities.

Victor Hugo on Pessimism.

In Scribner's Monthly, Mr. H. H. Boyesen gives an account of "Two Visits to Victor Hugo." In the course of conversation Hugo said that the theater of events in the twentieth century would be Africa, and added that all the other races are inevitably approaching the type of the white race, and will all in the end be white! This, however, was not the reader's only surprise, as will be seen from this extract:

"We have among us, too," I said, "an old and wise man who takes the same hopeful view of the future as you do; I mean Mr. Emerson. When patriotic men become discouraged at the flagrant abuse of our free institutions which they have daily to witness—when vulgar mediocrity and selfish ignorance seem triumphant, and culture, talent and purity are trodden in the dust—then there is sore need of a strong and cheerful voice to tell us that this is but a passing crisis, from which we shall emerge the stronger and better for our very knowledge of evil. This is the gospel Mr. Emerson preaches at all critical times."

"Mr. Emerson," said Victor Hugo, giving the name a decidedly French out. "Who is he? I never heard of him."

I gave a brief sketch of Mr. Emerson's life, and dwelt especially upon the profundity of his thought and his large ideal vision.

"I am glad," resumed our host when I had finished, "that you have such men in America. They are needed everywhere; but they are rare. The wise man is never a pessimist. A pessimist is a narrow-hearted, narrow-brained man, with a contracted mental horizon, who allows himself to get frightened at the first severe squall, and imagines the ship of state will founder. I challenge any of these shallow gentlemen, who are always seeing a catastrophe ahead and prophesying disaster and ruin—I challenge them to tell me whether they can point to a single historic period which has not, in its totality, been a great advance upon its predecessors. I am sure they cannot. It is a mighty impulse which drives the world onward, and, in spite of traitors and bribe-takers and conquering and crowned criminals, it will move onward and ever onward toward higher and better states. I see in the twentieth century the sure and inevitable abolition of the great evils which now perplex us; new problems, growing out of a still more complex civilization, will then arise, and new ages will solve them."

He here turned with a friendly nod toward me, put his hand on my knee, and said:

"Keep that in mind, sir. Do not forget it."

"You evidently take me to be a pessimist," I remarked, smiling.

"You betrayed your sympathy with the pessimists," he replied, gravely, "and they are not deserving of sympathy. They are pitiable objects, these whimpering cynics, who imagine that the universe is out of joint because they have an impaired digestion. Nor have I any patience with those superior critics who, for fear of soiling their dainty hands, shirk their duties as men and citizens."

Look Into Your Cellars.

Those who live in nice houses and have luxuriously-furnished parlors and bedrooms in some instances never look into the cellars beneath them. These underground places are often the sources of disease. Materials are carelessly thrown into the cellars by thoughtless servants and are left to decompose. Without ventilation, moisture may exist in the cellar to an extent to injure the healthfulness of the whole house. In farmers' houses the cellar is often the storehouse for all kinds of vegetables, and when any of these are in a decaying condition they affect the atmosphere. Neglected cisterns beneath the basement floor may spread malaria. In some instances portable furnaces are placed in the cellar and all the warm air which is distributed through the house is really cellar air. But when this is not the case the ordinary furnace may produce in its air-chamber a sufficient draught to take in the poisonous gases of the cellar. When there are no furnaces to take up and distribute through a building the injurious gases of the cellar they may, nevertheless, be distributed not only through open windows, cracks and crevices, but sometimes, by their penetrating power, through the porosity of floors and walls. In view of these facts the cellar, as well as other portions of the house, should be investigated by intelligent heads now and then.—Dr. Foote's Monthly.

The Armies of Europe.

No wonder Europe is suffering from hard times. The army of each country is a burden that would almost bankrupt a continent. Russia has a military force of 3,046,800 men, 600,800 belonging to the reserve and 2,446,800 to the standing army. France has a regular army of 1,689,000 men, which, with the territorial army of 1,208,000, makes a total of 2,897,000. In 1892 this will be increased by 600,000 reserve men. The German army consists of 2,004,300 men. In 1892 to total strength of Italy will be 2,024,200 men. Austro-Hungary possesses 1,194,318 soldiers. The armies of Europe make a total of over 16,000,000 who are learning the art of war, and who can be called on at any moment by the great powers. With such an Old Man of the Sea as this on its shoulders how can Europe expect prosperity?

STRANGERS who meet Jay Gould, the railroad monarch, always express surprise at his apparent youthfulness.

FAREWELL.

BY [illegible]

Farewell! farewell!
As yon tongued bell
Rings out its cadence,
Day by day and years hence,
Imagine 'tis my voice.
Wilt thou then rejoice?

Farewell, my love!
Pale white stars above
Have not been more true—
Have not been so to you
As I have been. Farewell,
Forever fare thee well!

Farewell, and when too late
I know that your heart will wake
To a realization sad—
Sad as the flight of time. Had
I not loved thee so well
I would and could not tell.

Thee of my priceless boon,
I swear to thee by yon pale moon
That I love thee. Hear me swear
By all the sacred ties. Wear
I not thy ring of trust?
It proves as iron and will rust!

Farewell! farewell!
And in years I shall not tell
Aught of all I suffered. Gone
All the sweetness of the song
Of love. 'Twas sung by you
Oh! so tender, sweet and true.

White buds betoken and blow,
'Tis the summer, and you know
That day of days, when you,
With thine eyes of azure blue,
Kissed my lips with zest.
Oh! what bliss! what rest!

A LITTLE Waterloo Sunday-school miss was asked by her teacher, "What must people do in order to go to heaven?" "Die, I suppose," replied the little one. The teacher did not question her any further.

"WHO," said a member of the Canadian House of Commons to the members who were trying by interruptions to choke him off, "who brayed here?" "It was an echo," retorted a member, amid a yell of delight.

AFTER spending three mortal hours in getting to windward and crawling carefully toward two supposed big buffaloes, a Western hunter found his supposed game to be a St. Louis girl taking a walk on the prairie with her ear-muffs on.

"NO, THANK you; I never waltz; ma says if any of the young men want to hug me they must do it on the sly; she won't have them mussing my dress up, and leaving finger marks on my white waist, so long as she does the washing and has to support me."

COMMODORE VANDERBILT once visited a spiritual medium, who commenced business by saying, "Your first wife wishes to communicate with you." "Perhaps so," said the Commodore abruptly, "but that is not what I came here for. She can wait."

REMINISCENCES OF SUMMER.

I'm sitting on the stile, Mary;
I sob, and smile, and sneeze;
'Twill only be a while, Mary,
I think, until I freeze;
The ulster coat I used to wear
Has vanished like a dream;
We ate it up, I do declare,
In chocolate ice-cream.

YOUNG men should always beware of the following paragraph, which was started by a Philadelphia paper, and is now going the rounds. The chances are that the man who wrote it is tied to a woman with a hand like a Japanese fan, and a voice that would make a buzz-saw pause in astonishment. It reads: "Marriage is a safe way to gamble; if you win, you win a pile, and if you lose, you don't lose anything."

AN ODE TO COMFORT.

Thou thing of ruddy, rosy redness, hail,
With all thy prickly furze to irritate,
For thou dost laugh defiance at the gale
That fain would shake
And with its bluster quake
Our corporosities well girt
By thy delights that militate
'Gainst every ill O flannel undershirt!
We choose thee red afore we do thee white—
Not that the red is warmer or more fair—
Not that the red is comelier to the sight—
But, spite of dust
And coal and smoke and must,
The red defies appearance of dirt;
So then we choose thee red and wear
Thee next our hearts, O goodly undershirt!

—St. Louis Times.

OCCASIONALLY you will meet a young man who gets on the train somewhere in Ohio, and when some fellow passenger asks him how far he is going, he will say, "Omaha!" in the tone of a brakeman calling a station, and then look up and down the car to observe the amazement and awe of the other passengers, and you will notice that he looks a little bit disappointed because they do not take off their hats and ask to shake hands with him and want to know where he comes from and all about him. But by-and-by when he learns, from casual remarks dropped carelessly now and then, that the man behind him is going to San Francisco, and the one in front of him is going to Japan, and the old fellow on the other side of the aisle is just returning from St. Petersburg, the young man drops his voice to a husky whisper, shrinks down into his ulster so that no one can see him, and tells the next man who asks him about it that he is only going out here a little ways.—Burlington Hawk-Eye.

SHALL THE RAILROADS BE KING?

The Recent Great Startling Combinations and the Public Interest.

[From the New York Herald.]

Transactions in railroad shares are always topics of public interest, and, if the interest may be supposed to be in any degree proportionate to the extent of the transaction, the attention given in financial circles to the great sale of New York Central shares just made by Mr. Vanderbilt cannot be regarded as in any degree exaggerated. In fact, this event has not only compelled the minute attention of the great financial world in two hemispheres, but it has excited the wonder and piqued the curiosity of the public generally outside of financial circles; and, if it has not especially stirred the imaginations of our "statesmen" and politicians with its glimpse at the possible public effects of operations properly within the field of private concerns, this is merely because politics is the only activity in which Americans engage without any fair comprehension of all the limits and relations of that pursuit. Wall street and Lombard street are two great pivots upon which the money world of our age turns, and the money world of this age is certainly more vital than any other part of it; for the heroic, the scientific, the literary, the political activities all wait upon the men who are filled with the characteristic spirit of the current civilization. And it cannot be a concern without the farthest reaching relations that compels for many days the exclusive attention of the two great money centers here and in London.

Precisely how the parties to this great operation have sketched in their minds' eyes the respective consequences of such a sale and purchase—what specific objects, secret or ostensible, either side may have had in view—they have not set forth to the public; and that is of the less consequence, because in great concerns, in concerns of the first magnitude, whether in the sphere of finance or in any other sphere, it is always true that the most important results are not those that were counted upon by the men who planned the event. It is commonly said on a small scale in the theater that, as nobody ever knows what is to be the fate of a new piece before it is actually played, so nobody ever knows what character is to bear away the honors. Possibly it may be the hero who shall shine forth in the splendor of primacy as the play-wright intended; but it is just as likely to be his lackey. And in this respect, as in so many others, the stage is only the world in miniature. Grand transactions are planned for one purpose and serve another. Some unobserved line or phrase in a law proves when you get into court to be its effective part. We have had statutes passed to force inflation, and they forced contraction. Certainly the framers of the national constitution never intended that the Government of this country should be in the hands of political conventions, or they would at least have named such bodies. People may trouble themselves the less with Mr. Vanderbilt's schemes and those of his customers from the consideration that everybody is, fully as much as those persons are, in the confidence of the forces that will actually determine the consequences of this sale.

Doubtless, however, this event may be fairly regarded as one of the early moves in a grand combination with a view to one more of those peculiar conflicts sufficiently known to the public as railroad wars—great schemes of rivalry which sacrifice the welfare of the people to the large projects and games of the money lords in order to enforce rigorously upon one or another set of lines the pitiless principle of the survival of the fittest. From the standpoint of the great railroad projects the Atlantic seaboard is regarded as a mere dumping place for the produce of the West on one hand and for the produce of Europe on the other, and the great endeavor of combined corporations is to secure the largest dump at their favored spot. Shall this be Baltimore, shall it be Philadelphia, shall it be New York city? That is the ultimate inquiry of all their schemes. With the combination of which the Central becomes a part by this transaction it is very likely that this city will stand a fair chance to hold its own against cities that have had some advantages over us in previous conflicts of this nature, and with that result, as it bears favorably upon our prosperity, we have no reason to find fault, unless it be secured at too great cost to the country generally.

And that is to be contemplated always as one of the principal consequences in these cases. No local advantage is worth the cost that is to be secured through a fact which affects detrimentally the country at large and that proves injurious to such a great machinery of prosperity as the railroad system. And every railroad war is a detriment to the country. The cheap freights and cheap fares that are the temporary symptoms are like the exaggerated activity, physical or mental, of a man in delirium; they mean ultimate exhaustion, the ruin of shareholders the forcing of roads into the hands of wreckers, the demoralization and corruption of Boards of Directors and of the management generally, the perversion of a great instrument of modern civilization from its legitimate public uses to be a mere trap for securing dishonest gain. Two or three days ago Mr. S. L. M. Barlow testified before the railroad investigators of a case in which certain individuals in a Board of Directors were paid $65,000 each to resign their places, and that was in order that men more facile—perhaps men of a lower price—might be put there. If Boards of Directors in railroad corporations and other parts of the administrative machinery go down these particular "slippery ways of vice;" if their places are sought and occupied not for legitimate commercial and financial reasons, but only as bits of property to be sold out, then our commercial world must tend to the same sort of pitiful rottenness that is observed in our political world in many municipalities, notably in this city; and any fact which tends in that direction is a public calamity; and railroad wars or other events that lead to making the shares of a corporation the baubles of speculation do lead that way. Certainly we do not say that the sale of Central, whoever may be the real buyer, must be evil; but it is clear that a combination which has required such a guarantee as the sale actually made means that its purposes shall not be stayed or limited at a critical moment by the scruples of the man who inherited the Central as "a great trust."

There is one effect of this event upon which we may count as tolerably certain, and that is that it will force upon the minds of thoughtful men throughout the country some distinct consideration of the fact that interests of such moment to the public welfare—interests that concern the convenience and fortune of every individual—ought not at any time or in any country to be at the mercy or subject to the dictation and the caprice of so small a number of men as now control the great mass of railroad interests in the United States. In other countries the public dominion makes itself felt in these concerns; the general will, as declared through the law, marks a fixed limit to the vagaries of speculative trickery. Here the general will of the nation does not touch the subject, and the local will, as heard in the State Legislatures, mostly declares itself like the Directors above referred to in order that it may be bought out. Our people please themselves with the fancy that they are free because they have the right to meddle a little in politics now and then. In conventions, in Legislatures and in all similar places they chatter and twaddle and scream like so many crows and jays over the eternal principles of freedom as secured in the political fabric, and, meanwhile, the great economical facts of life—the facts which are and always were the really shaping and controlling forces in the political destinies of a people—sweep rapidly and certainly forward on lines that indicate the will and movement of a despotic spirit. In that movement a great collision with the popular will is in preparation.

Mr. Jay Gould's Personal Habits.

Mr. Gould's millions now crowd close to those of Vanderbilt. He is a man of finer texture than the old Commodore's son. He doesn't run to fine houses, costly stables and blooded steeds. At night, when he dismisses his operators from his own house in Fifth avenue, and enters up in a little book the telegraphic report of the receipts of the various railroads which he owns, he does not go to a club to carouse, to a banquet to steam up with champagne, or to a theater; he retires to the recesses of a peaceful library, and, with his young sons about him, reads the Latin classics, the world forgetting, but not by the world forgot—by a large majority. The next morning early he has the telegraph doing lightning service, and he is sending an electric shock through Wall street as soon as the bulls and bears come into that field for pasture. Mr. Gould is a liberal man, although when he makes a bequest he does not have the information written in manifold and sent to all the newspapers. The first news New York had of his gift to the Memphis sufferers of $5,000 came from Memphis, as did the news of the second gift of $5,000.

Mr. Gould, being a small man of little physical prowess, is naturally not disposed to put himself recklessly in the way of the horns of the bulls and the claws of the bears. There are some men in Wall street, as Mr. Gould has reason to know, who wish to resent their losses with their fists, and are disposed to follow Maj. Selover's example and dispatch him bodily down into a convenient area. Accordingly, Mr. Gould keeps his office guarded by a stout Irishman, who prevents the intrusion of visitors, and he has usually a private way to get into the street. He has, too, it is said, a big Italian bookkeeper, who accompanies him on many of his business trips about town, and stands ready to protect his millionaire employer.—St. Louis Republican.

The Vote of New York.

The official vote of New York is out at last, and is as follows:

GOVERNOR.
Cornell, R.	418,670
Robinson, D.	375,777
Kelly, Tam.	77,484
Lewis, Gbk.	19,700
Mears, Pro.	4,486
Cornell over Robinson, 42,893. Majority against C. rnell 52,889.
LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR.
Hoskins, R.	435,262
Potter, D.	435,140
Hoskins' plu., 122.
SECRETARY OF STATE.
Carr, R.	436,001
Beach, D.	434,146
Carr's plu., 1,855.

COMPTROLLER.
Wadsworth, R.	439,189
Olcott, D.	432,316
Wadsworth's plu., 6,873.
ATTORNEY GENERAL.
Ward, R.	437,367
Schoonmaker, D.	432,743
Ward's plu., 4,624.
STATE ENGINEER.
Seymour, D.	439,615
Soule, R.	425,591
Seymour's plu., 14,024.
STATE TREASURER.
Wendell, R.	436,253
Mackin, D.	433,343
Wendell's plu., 2,910.

The total vote cast for Governor was 896,101, being 117,949 less than the vote for President in 1876. The highest vote received by any Republican was 439,189 for Wadsworth, for Comptroller, and the highest vote received by any Democrat was 439,615 for Seymour, for State Engineer. The combined Democratic vote for Robinson and Kelly for Governor is 34,635 more than the Republican vote for Cornell, and 14,082 more than the largest vote polled for the highest Republican candidate. Leaving the triangular Gubernatorial contest out of the question, and viewing the returns from the standpoint of the square party fight for the six other State officers, we find the lowest Republican majority to be 122 for Lieutenant Governor, and the highest to be 6,678 for Comptroller, while Horatio Seymour, Jr., Democrat, is chosen State Engineer by 14,024. There's a battleground for 1880!—Philadelphia Times.

Her Husband's Clock.

She laid her pretty hand upon her husband's shoulder. "Henry, love, there's something the matter with the clock; will you see to it?" So he took off his coat, removed the face and fingers, examined the interior parts with a large magnifying-glass, blew into them with the bellows, oiled them thoroughly, and did all that mortal ingenuity could devise. But it was of no avail, and so, despairing, at a late hour of the night, he went to bed and slept the sleep of the righteous. Next morning at breakfast quoth she: "Harry, dear, I know what was the matter with the clock." "Well?" "It only wanted winding."

SIMPLE BILL OF FARE

For a Christmas Dinner.

All good recipe-books give bills of fare for different occasions; bills of fare for grand dinners; bills of fare for little dinners; dinners to cost so much per head; dinners "which can be easily prepared with one servant," and so on. They give bills of fare for one week; bills of fare for each day in a month, to avoid too great monotony in diet. There are bills of fare for dyspeptics; bills of fare for consumptives; bills of fare for fat people, and bills of fare for thin; and bills of fare for hospitals, asylums, and prisons, as well as for gentlemen's houses. But among them all we never saw the one which we give below. It has never been printed in any book; but it has been used in families. We are not drawing on our imagination for its items. We have sat at such dinners; we have helped prepare such dinners; we believe in such dinners; they are within every body's means. In fact, the most marvelous thing about this bill of fare is that this dinner does not cost a cent. Ho! all ye that are hungry and thirsty, and would like so cheap a Christmas dinner, listen to this bill of fare for a Christmas dinner:

First Course.—GLADNESS.—This must be served hot. No two housekeepers make it alike; no fixed rule can be given for it. It depends, like so many of the best things, chiefly on memory; but, strangely enough, it depends quite as much on proper forgetting as on proper remembering. Worries must be forgotten. Troubles must be forgotten. Yes, even sorrow itself must be denied and shut out. Perhaps this is not quite possible. Ah! we all have seen Christmas days on which sorrow would not leave our hearts nor our houses. But even sorrow can be compelled to look away from its sorrowing for a festival hour which is so solemnly joyous as Christ's birthday. Memory can be filled full of other things to be remembered. No soul is entirely destitute of blessings—absolutely without comfort. Perhaps we have but one. Very well; we can think steadily of that one, if we try. But the probability is that we have more than we can count. No man has yet numbered the blessings, the mercies, the joys of God! We are all richer than we think, and if we once set ourselves to reckoning up the things of which we are glad, we shall be astonished at their number.

Gladness, then, is the first item—the first course on our bill of fare for a Christmas dinner.

Entrees.—Love, garnished with smiles.

Gentleness, with sweet-wine sauce of laughter.

Gracious speech, cooked with any fine, savory herbs, such as drollery, which is always in season, or pleasant reminiscence, which no one need be without, as it keeps for years, sealed or unsealed.

Second Course.—HOSPITALITY.—The precise form of this also depends on individual preferences. We are not undertaking here to give exact recipes, only a bill of fare.

In some houses hospitality is brought on surrounded with relatives. This is very well. In others it is dished up with dignitaries of all sorts; men and women of position and estate for whom the host has special likings or uses. This gives a fine effect to the eye, but cools quickly, and is not, in the long run, satisfying.

In a third class, best of all, it is served in simple shapes, but with a great variety of unfortunate persons—such as lonely people from lodging-houses, poor people of all grades, widows and childless in their affliction. This is the kind most preferred; in fact, never abandoned by those who have tried it.

For Dessert.—Mirth, in glasses.

Gratitude and faith beaten together and piled up in snowy shapes. These will look light if run over night in the molds of solid trust and patience.

A dish of the bonbons good cheer and kindliness with every-day mottoes; knots and reasons in shape of puzzles and answers; the whole ornamented with apples of gold in pictures of silver, of the kind mentioned in the Book of Proverbs.

This is a short and simple bill of fare. There is not a costly thing in it; not a thing which cannot be procured without difficulty.

If meat is desired, it can be added That is another excellence about our bill of fare. It has nothing in it which makes it incongruous with the richest or the plainest tables. It is not overcrowded by the addition of roast goose and plum-pudding; it is not harmed by the addition of herring and potatoes. Nay, it can give flavor and richness to broken bits of stale bread served on a doorstep and eaten by beggars.

We might say much more about this bill of fare. We might, perhaps, confess that it has an element of the supernatural; that its origin is lost in obscurity; that though, as we said, it has never been printed before, it has been known in all ages; that the martyrs feasted upon it; that generations of the poor called blessed by Christ, have laid out banquets by it; that exiles and prisoners have lived on it, and the despised and forsaken and rejected in all countries have tasted it. It is also true that when any great King ate well and throve on his dinner it was by the same magic food. The young and the free and the glad, and all rich men in costly houses, even they have not been well fed without it.

And, though we have called it a bill of fare for a Christmas dinner, that is only that men's eyes may be caught by its name, and that they, thinking it a specialty for a festival, may learn and understand its secret, and henceforth, laying all their dinners according to its magic order, may "eat unto the Lord."

"Ugly Girls."

The old aunt who is a confidante of youthful troubles, and helps to smooth family jars; the maiden sister, who acts as nurse when there is sickness in the house; the middle-aged, unmarried daughter, who keeps house for an invalid father and mother, and soothes the declining years of the old people by her dutiful attendance; all these are types of women who may be found in no small numbers among "ugly girls."—London Truth.

INDIANA ITEMS.

A SERIES of weekly lectures to workingmen will be given in Terre Haute this winter.

DURING the past week very important discoveries of coal have been made in Pike county.

THE next convention of the Indiana Music Teachers' State Association will be held at Fort Wayne on December 29 to 31, inclusive.

A NOTARY PUBLIC in Bartholomew county has been arrested for marrying a couple under the mistaken idea that he might lawfully do so.

TIMBER thieves in Dubois county are cutting and selling wood from State lands, and Auditor Manson has notified the Sheriff of the county to arrest the depredators.

JUDGE A. L. ROACHE has been appointed, by the Governor, a member of the Ohio River Improvement Commission, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Lazarus Noble.

IT is believed that the first annual report of the Indiana Bureau of Statistics will show at least 75 per cent. of answers to the questions sent out. The Massachusetts bureau the first year only got 10 per cent. of answers.

WILLIAM T. S. MANLY, County Treasurer of Cass county, and a prominent citizen of Logansport, died in that city last week. He had held the offices of Street Commissioner, City Councilman and Sheiff, the latter position two terms.

THOS. POOLE, aged 94 years and eight months, died at his home in Butlerville, recently. He was a gallant soldier in the war of 1812, and was the next to the oldest man in Jennings county; has over 100 grandchildren and eighty-eight great-grandchildren living.

A YOUNG man, named Wiley, residing near Rushville, was hunting, and upon attempting to discharge his gun at a coon the gun was so heavily loaded that it burst, driving the breech-pin entirely through his head, making a terrible wound from which he died in a short time.

Annual Report of the Auditor of State.

The following statement is a condensed exhibit of the balance in the State treasury of each of the funds, Nov. 1, 1878, and the amount received and disbursed during the fiscal year from the several funds, closing Oct. 31, 1879:

Amount of cash in the treasury Oct. 31, 1878	$524,256.46

The above amount was the aggregate of balances belonging to the various funds of the treasury, as follows:

Colonizing Indiana.

Two hundred negroes arrived here to-day from North Carolina, on their way to Indiana, where they are to be colonized. Most of them had barely enough money to reach this city. Their fare from here to Indianapolis is made up by the Republican committee of this city. The Republican committee in Indianapolis has made arrangements to care for them on their arrival. This is only one of the many delegations headed Indiana-ward. Fifteen hundred negroes will come on in a few days. They will be rushed into the State until enough have been put there to paint out in black the Democratic majority in that State.—Washington dispatch to Chicago Times.

THE OLD GRANT GUARD.

[From the New York Sun.]

It is claimed for Gen. Grant as a peculiar merit that "he does not go back on his friends." Fidelity to friendship is a noble virtue when the objects of it are deserving. It becomes a low crime when they are venal and unworthy. As President, Grant disgraced that great office by extending the protection of the Executive over felons and thieves whose rascalities were notorious to the whole country. But for his scandalous interference with the course of justice, Babcock and others like him would to-day be cracking stone in striped suits. They were saved from the penitentiary because the Chief Magistrate was base enough to prostitute his trust in their behalf.

Babcock is holding an honorable and profitable position in the Engineer Corps at Baltimore, over the heads of honest men, when public opinion has long ago consigned him to infamy in the rogues' gallery. If he had not been the possessor of secrets of the White House which, if exposed, would have caused immense trouble, and if he had not been capable of exposing them for his own interest, Grant would have hesitated long before employing all the authority of the departments to aid in a technical defense, and before furnishing secretly to Babcock's counsel information which rightfully belonged to the prosecution.

The ring chiefs and the plunderers, who flourished during the era of Grantism, are all rushing to the front and shouting lustily for a third term. Secor Robeson opened his confidence freely the other day, and said the movement was bound to succeed. In that event Mr. Conkling would be called to the first place in the Cabinet, and he himself would take the Navy Department again, more in vindication of his character than for any other reason.

Belknap went especially to Chicago to assist at the ovation in that city. He does not believe the Nicaragua canal project has any solid basis, so that it might serve as a diversion to prevent Grant from being the Republican candidate next year. Belknap stands very near Grant, who expressed formal regret for his resignation as Secretary of War, after he had confessed his guilt in selling post traderships. Therefore, when Belknap says the Nicaragua scheme is a humbug, he probably knows what he is talking about, and is more candid than the political managers who are seeking to throw dust in the eyes of the public. In the event of a restoration, of course Belknap expects to be vindicated by resuming the War Department.

Delano has his eye steadily fixed on the Interior, which he converted into a bonanza during the period when Indian contracts were sold to the highest bidder, and the improved lands of poor settlers were spoliated by railroad corporations that had become experts in the golden rule of addition, division and science.

Chorpenning Creswell, who reduced straw bidding in the postoffice to an exact science, and, as was said of the Prince of Wales in the Lady Mordaunt case, swore like a gentleman before the committees of investigation, believes that a strong man is needed to carry him back into an office which is alleged to have yielded a profit of a round hundred thousand a year, exclusive of the cost of luxurious living.

The ancient Tait, who hired an army of Deputy Marshals to aid the Hayes fraud, and who paid nearly half a million out of the treasury for partisan service, clings to the hope of a chance to make opinions to order, as Grant's Attorney General. He is a boomer whose zeal is not tempered by age and is stimulated by ambition.

All the old guard and their confederates, like hounds on a scent of game, are in full cry. They look forward to the day of restoration as the Israelites did to the land of promise. They have parceled out the honors in advance, and settled the equitable principle of a distribution of the spoils, so as to avoid quarrel hereafter. All this is considerate; but perhaps the chickens are counted before the eggs are hatched.

[From the Springfield Republican.]

Grant was 50 years old when he became President the second time. Probably not one of the thousands who are prating about a change in Grant's character by the simple process of going around the world have ever seen a man over 50 change his habits, his principles or his friends. Grant's character from 1873 to 1877 is his character to-day. He is already showing it by seeking his old associates. Belknap's "brazen face and yellow beard" was noticed in a carriage behind Grant's in the Chicago procession. He was present at the receptions of the week, and "Gen. Belknap paid his respects to the Grant party and was warmly received by the General and Mrs. Grant," says an eye-witness. "Boss" Shepherd had a particular invitation from Grant to meet him at the Chicago celebration, according to the Hartford Times' Washington correspondent, a man usually accurate in minor Washington gossip. It has always been understood that Maj. Babcock was in communication with Grant during his absence. Where the "old man" is, there the "boys" will gather themselves together.

THE LEGAL TENDERS.

Programme of the Republican Party.

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer.]

Advices from Washington city are that some Republican Senators and members of the House are at present unfavorable to retiring any of the existing volume of legal tenders, fearing the effect of such action upon the Presidential election of next year. No Republican who opposes such reduction need, however, to be deceived by the contemplated delay. The retirement of all the $346,000,000 and upward of greenbacks is the Republican programme, and if that party succeeds next year the plan will be carried out. This $346,000,000 draws no interest, circulates as money, and commands a small premium over gold. Funded in 4-per-cent. bonds, it would draw about $14,800,000 interest per annum, payable quarterly. What need is there of thus increasing the burden of our large public debt? The only true answer is, the national banks demand it, and the Republican party is the party of the national banks. They are arguing (?) that the Government ought not, upon principle, to issue any paper promises to circulate as money. Why? Surely there is nothing in the Federal constitution forbidding it. After the crash of 1837-1840 the Sub-Treasury law enacted by Congress expressly gave the Government that power, it being thought much better for the Government to rely in time of need upon its own credit than to give its credit to a national bank and pay the bank interest for giving back to it that credit. Series of demand treasury notes, issued before and at the beginning of the late war, under the provisions of the Sub-Treasury law, are instances of the unquestionable exercise of this power. Taking it all in all, that Sub-Treasury law was the wisest and most practical financial measure ever adopted in the United States. From its enactment until this day all its main provisions have remained upon the Federal statute book, and their observance has done almost everything in enabling the country to extricate itself from the crushing debt occasioned by the war, as was the case from the crashes of 1837 and 1857.

The national banks wish their notes to supply the place of the United States legal tenders, they taking that amount in bonds at 4 per cent., payable quarterly. They will thus reap $14,000,000 interest annually paid them every quarter. They will then loan out $385,000,000 of their notes—promises to pay debts—at from 7 to 10 per cent. interest. This they can do, as the Government, upon the pledge of the bonds, will have given them its credit and be paying them quarterly $14,000,000 a year for taking it, and their notes will circulate wherever the Government credit extends, and would not circulate, except locally, without it. No wonder the national banks want the greenbacks retired; and they will inevitably succeed in their desires if the Republicans succeed in the coming Presidential election. No one need be deceived by the do-nothing policy of the Republicans at this session of Congress, though urged to action by Secretary Sherman and President Hayes. They intend to do the bidding of the national bankers as soon as they dare, which will be immediately after the Presidential election is over, if they are successful. Our national debt has been enormous, and is yet large. It has, as can be demonstrated, been, by the legerdemain of Wall street and national bankers, already paid twice over, and they seem to desire its payment three times—that number being, in the estimation of the superstitious, a charm.

Our First in Heaven.

The touching sentiment, "Our first in heaven," appeared after an obituary notice in a Philadelphia paper, and the father of the child came into the office raging mad. It was the third death in the family, and he desired to know of the clerk where he supposed the other two had gone.

A Phase of California Life—A Story of Ups and Downs.

[Nevada Transcript.]

The atmosphere of good luck that hangs around some men is past understanding. Take the case of Bob Morrow, the San Francisco manipulator who owns St. Julien, the fastest horse in the world, to illustrate by, for instance. The reporter met a forty-niner, who used to know him in the days when a "biled shirt" worn among the mountain miners indicated that the possessor was either a blackleg or a Gospel expounder, the chances being ninety-nine to one that he was the former, for parsons were then as scarce as copper pennies, almost. He arrived in Virginia City when the camp was a mere infant, so to speak. The first thing he did after getting here was to skirmish around and hunt up a shovel, pick and rocker. With these he began scratching along Deer Creek for gold. By dint of perseverance and hard work—his knowledge of mining did not exceed his intimacy with Bible passages—and an exercise of check, he got enough to alleviate the pangs of hunger to a bearable extent. He stayed around here till 1859, and by that time his clothes were so tattered and torn that he had to put his old hat under him to keep his bare body from coming in contact with the chair whenever he sat down, and then decided to emigrate. George Hearst, Joe Clark, A. E. Head and a number of the other boys, whose lines were too hard for comfort, wanted to go with him, but the whole caboodle of them were dead broke, and figure as they could no alternative presented whereby they could skare up enough coin to get out of camp with. Finally, Arthur Hagadorn came to the rescue He fitted some of them out with a mule apiece, provisions and coin. They made a bee line for the Comstock. The next time his old townies heard from Morrow he was on top of a wave of prosperity; that is, had got into the Savage and some other big mines at Virginia City. For several years he reveled in wealth. After enjoying the rapidly acquired shekels for a few years, they slipped away from him, and he was busted once more. His will and energy didn't peter out when his money did, and, making a little raise, he sprang boldly into the arena of the stock market. Since then he hasn't drawn a blank in the lottery of life, so far as heard of. As a director of the bank of California alone, to say nothing of all the other soft things he dropped into through the influence of the deceased Ralston, he has glory enough to satisfy any common man. As to the three individuals named above who took sail on the mules with Morrow, they are all in San Francisco, doing more or less in stocks. One or two of them have become pretty well fixed in respect to this world's goods.

Richland and Fairfield Institute.

Institute convened at Corunna, at 9 o'clock, a. m. December 6th, 1879. The teachers were called to order by Superintendent MacIntosh, who delivered an able opening address, after which the regular exercises were commenced. The subject of monthly examinations in common schools was brought up by Mr. Hersh and discussed at length by the teachers present; among the suggestions offered in that connection the following are worthy of mention: "They create a desire for promotion;" "They learn pupils to compose and write;" "They restore last knowledge." It was further suggested that fair questions, sufficient time and actual grade be given. Miss Rush conducted a class in primary reading by first illustrating the word method, finishing by reading in the third reader, in which she proved her ability to master that branch of study to perfection. Mr. McIntyre then took up the subject of primary geography, giving instructions from the state map and requiring his pupils to bound their own township, as well as other townships and DeKalb county; also, to give the the number of postoffices and the location of each in the county, as well as the principal towns and cities in the state; showing the necessity of posting pupils and acquainting them with their own county and state map before branching out elsewhere. Mr. Squires was then called upon to give instructions on teaching grammar, his illustrations were good, suggesting object teaching as the beginning of the study. Institute then adjourned for dinner. At 1 o'clock p. m. the county superintendent addressed the institute on general school government, cautioning teachers to keep a good register, urging neatness, proper ventilation, and a temperature of from 65° to 70° in the school room, and that the trustee ought to provide each school with a thermometer and other necessaries. "What constitutes good behavior" was also ably discussed by the superintendent. Mr. Ash, when called upon, offered some good suggestions concerning programmes in common schools, and how to arrange and time the same, insisting upon teachers not to deviate from the established rules, and always dismiss the class when the time is up. Mr. Hoffman addressed the institute on the subject of history and how to teach it. Miss Cooper suggested ideas to prevent whispering in school, which were the subject of considerable discussion by the teachers. Mr. Miller gave his method of keeping good order in the school room, the matter of first importance being the good will of the pupils. Helps and hindrances in the schoolroom was ably discussed by the teachers; helps, the good will of parents and pupils, with well arranged classes, good books and good apparatus; hindrances, the opposite. Bad weather and muddy roads prevented a full attendance. The teachers return thanks to the citizens of Corunna for their generosity. Institute adjourned.

Special Announcement.

We take pleasure in announcing that we have made arrangements with the publishers of the State Sentinel which enable us to make the following very liberal offer:

To all persons who pay their subscription account to date, we will send the Courier and Weekly Sentinel one year for $2.50 in advance. In addition to this we will make each subscriber a present of "The Law of the Farm," by Jas. B. McCreilis, of the Indiana bar. This valuable phamphlet ought to be in the hands of every farmer in the state. The work embraces the following subjects:

1st. How to buy a farm.
2nd. How far the farm extends, or its proper boundaries.
3rd What the deed of a farm includes.
4th The farmer's rights in the road.
5th As to farm fences.
6th As to estray and trespassing animals.
7th The farmer's liabilities for his animals.
8th Of dogs—the farmer's liability for and protection against.
9th Of water rights and drainage.
10th Of trespassing on the farm.
11th The rights of adjoining proprietors to fruit and other trees on and near boundary lines.

The Indiana Weekly State Sentinel is an eight-page paper, (the same as the Courier) and will contain a supplement of two additional pages about half of the time. It is the recognized organ of the democracy of Indiana, and will always be found full of news of a general character. Its editorials present strong argument in favor of economy and against class legislation, and its agricultural department is adapted to the wants of every farmer.

Remember that the $2.50 must be paid in advance, and the Courier subscription account must be paid to date, in order to secure this liberal offer. tf.

WHAT PAYS BEST AFTER HARVEST

Is a serious consideration of its cost and profits, and how to economize by comparing your own experience with that of others in farm labor.

Only $1.15 a Year,

Will place you in possession of the only newspaper that gives the actual experience and experiments of practical farming.

"The Cincinnati Weekly Enquirer, is the medium through which producers of every class make known their own experience, and seek that of others."

"The best teacher of farming, is the farmer himself! A fact fully demonstrated in the department (two pages a week) devoted to the farmer and his household in the Weekly Enquirer."

"Every department is complete."

"It is worth $100.00 a year to farmers, but costs only $1.15."

"The best is the cheapest."

"It always has the news in advance of all others."

"There is none better."

"It is the best political friend the people have, advocating its democracy upon the principles of justice and equity to all."

"It is the original greenbacker."

Such are a few of the many compliments paid to the Cincinnati Enquirer, by the press throughout the country.

The merits of its editorials, agricultural, political, correspondence, literary, telegraphic news and commercial departments combine to make it all that is required in an A No. 1, first-class family journal.

THE CHARACTER OF MR. HENDRICKS.

Some Incidents in His Public Life—His Moral and Physical Courage—How He Disposed of a Vigilance Committee.

The following from "Jayhawker," the Indiana correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer, an acknowledged republican, gives the lie direct to the republican charges that Mr. Hendricks is a fence-rider, straddler, etc:

INDIANAPOLIS, December, 15, 1879.

A lie in politics may be so often repeated by the enemies of a man that his friends will come to believe it. This was notably the case with the late Senator Morton. And it is none the less the case with Gov. Hendricks. For years it has been charged that he is a coward, a straddler, a rider-of-the-fence, and all those things which go to make up a hesitating, time-serving character. Perhaps no man of his eminent abilities and frankness has ever been so much misunderstood. When he has talked freely, but with his natural modesty, the politician versed in the tricks of the business has assumed that he did not say all that he meant, or under the cover of words hid his real meaning. Twenty years of acquaintance, though opposed to him politically, has given me some knowledge of him that many who know him only casually could not possess.

In 1861 and 1862 partisan democrats were not popular in Indiana. A majority of the voters were democratic upon all issues, except the extension of slavery or the dissolution of the Union. Before the election in 1862, Indiana had sent over eighty thousand men, most of them voters, to the army. Probably nine out of every ten of those who had enlisted would have voted the republican ticket had they remained in the state, and the circumstances had been as they were. But so many had gone out of the state that the democracy carried the election, having a large majority in the legislature. That body elected Mr. Hendricks senator. The election was a proper one to have been made, for among all the democrats in the state, perhaps no one could or would have in that trying period been so loyal to the union of the states, and at the same time loyal to democratic principles, as was Mr. Hendricks. His record as senator was alway conservative, but always on the side of the Union and the constitution as the democracy understood it. While disagreeing with the policy of the then administration, he never, by vote or word, admitted a want of faith in our system or of the right of the government to protect itself or enforce the laws. In a conversation with a republican friend in 1864 he said, "The rebellion started as an organized resistance to the laws, and the government has accorded those in the rebellion the rights of belligerents in war. I am in favor of using all the power of the government to enforce all constitutional laws, but I am not in favor of the enactment of laws which are intended only to aid partisan measures, of which, if left on the statute books after the conflict ends, might be used by any party for purposes not consistent with the liberties which our form of government intended all the people should enjoy."

PERSONAL COWARDICE

Is one of the charges made against Mr. Hendricks, and is one that he deserves less than any other. It required moral and physical courage to be a democrat in Indiana after April, 1863. No one will pretend that Governor Morton did not hold the reins with a hard hand, and with good reason, too. But Governor Morton knew just where and when to bear down with a heavy hand, but thousands of his followers did not. While the governor was making an effort to enforce the laws his lieutenants were teaching the followers that all democrats were disloyal, and had no rights which any loyal man was bound to respect. This sort of teaching took root, and made it extremely unpleasant for conspicuous democrats. Indeed, it is not certain that if a soldier had seen fit to shoot Mr. Hendricks, he would have been punished at all. Under such circumstances, Mr. Hendricks, or any other man having an intelligent regard for life, would naturally be cautious in word and action.

THE SANITARY COMMISSION

Was organized in the latter part of 1863. It was well and honestly managed, and its books and accounts are now in the hands of Hon. Alfred Harrison, of this city. An inspection of them will show that Mr. Hendricks and Mr. McDonald were the most liberal donors in the city.

THE ASSASSINATION OF LINCOLN

Came as the crowning calamity of the war. The news reached Governor Morton on the night the fatal shot was fired. The next morning the city papers contained a call for a mass-meeting that day, stating that Mr. Hendricks and Mr. McDonald had been invited to be present, and they were. A series of resolutions had been prepared eulogizing Mr. Lincoln, deploring his death, and finally pledging all there assembled to give the same support to the administration of Mr. Johnson. Governor Morton spoke to the resolutions with his usual earnestness and vigor, and at the proper time Mr. Hendricks took the stand. When he reach the resolution in regard to Mr. Johnson he said "that he would support the new administration just so far——" At this point a man in the crowd, now a rabid democrat, shouted, "All or nothing," and the excited crowd took up the cry, which soon changed to "Hang him, kill him!" and the excited mass of people began surging toward the stand, evidently meaning to carry the suggestion into execution. Mr. Hendricks did not waver or flinch, though he must have felt that he was looking death square in the face. Governor Morton arose and motioned for a guard of soldiers to surround the stand, and at the same time asked the people to listen. He then said that Senator Hendricks must be allowed to speak, and when some one said go on, Mr. Hendricks continued just where he had stopped, "so far as my judgment and conscience shall approve his acts." Of course, there is no one now who was in that excited crowd willing to admit that he wanted Mr. Hendricks hung; but the excitement was so great that very few knew what they did say. Colonel Holloway, who was out in the crowd, shouted, "Let him speak; hear him out;" whereupon a woman sprang upon him, yelling "You traitor! you never had a son killed by the rebels, or you would not defend that man," and before the colonel could get away from her he was considerably worsted Few men who saw Mr. Hendricks that day ever doubted his physical courage afterward.

AS GOVERNOR OF INDIANA

He did not have the difficulties before him that Morton had; but with such as he had he showed as much readiness to use the soldier as the great war governor ever did. One of these cases is almost unknown, and yet it illustrates the character of the man. A vigilance committee was organized in Clarke county, and after ridding it of several bad characters, turned its attention to some enemies of some of the members. Amon those who were singled out was a poor devil who may or may not have been a bad man. A notice was sent him to leave the country by a certain time. The action of the vigilants was reported to Governor Hendricks, who at once telegraphed the sheriff of the county to visit him at Indianapolis. When he came, the governor, finding that he was in favor of executing the law, ordered him to return home and select fifty of the most trusty citizens of his county and swear them in as deputies, and promised at the same time to send him breech-loading rifles and ammunition. The sheriff obeyed the order—the guns were sent and the governor went down in person, and in three days the vigilants came in and agreed to disband and never organize again.

In action Mr. Hendricks was always prompt and fearless. As the executive he knew the law and never feared to enforce it. His official actions spoke for him; he did not make threats or promises. As a citizen he claims no greater respect for his own opinions than he is willing to accord to any other man, nor does he seek to thrust them upon the public. He is not an aggressive leader, because his respect for the law makes him conservative, but as an executive officer no man is more prompt or efficient in enforcing the law. In private life he is a quiet, kind neighbor, an admirer and friend of children, and very much in love with his good wife.

JAYHAWKER.

TILDEN'S HOME.

A Baronial Hall at Yonkers and a City Mansion.

[Yonkers letter to the Boston Herald.]

The president de jure, as Mr. Dana would say, lives in a baronial residence at the upper end of Yonkers "Greystone Park" was the property of Mr. John T. Waring, whom it cost a round half million of dollars. It could be rebuilt to-day for half that sum; but a house and grounds worth $250,000 ought to be good enough for even a president de jure. The house is as imposing architecturally as a castle. It is built of grayish stone, and is of extraordinary height. The furnishing of the house corresponds to the magnificence of the exterior. Perhaps the distinctive feature of the edifice is the noble hall, worthy of an English castle, of immense size, and with its western windows opening upon an unobstructed view of the imperial river and the rugged escarpments beyond. The estate is tastefully laid out, and there is a large variety of trees. Mr. Tilden bought this property for about $150,000. If he ever, as an American president, has occasion to entertain king, queen or kaiser, he can do so quite royally at Greystone, a residence which is beyond comparison with the executive mansion at Washington.

In the winter Mr. Tilden will live in his city house in Gramercy Park, now a familiar name. His city residence is spacious and luxuriously appointed. Gramercy Park is so called on account of the land thereabout belonging originally to the Gramercy farm. The residences of many of the oldest New York families front on the high-railed little park, locked in from public intrusion and devoted to neighborhood nurses and babies.

In all his ways Mr. Tilden is quiet and undemonstrative. He prefer the horse cars to a private carriage, and few people are aware that the smooth-faced, elderly gentleman in a silk hat, wrapped in a brown study while the car persues its ratling way, is the man to whom a majority of the American people gave their suffrages only three years ago. Mr. Tilden has a law office at No. 12 Wall street, but he is seldom there. Denominationally he is a Presbyterian, which is the middle state equivalent of New England "orthodoxy" or Congregationalism. He comes of old colony stock, and has little of the New York effusiveness. Down on Cape Cod he would be considered a mighty sharp selectman. He houses himself magnificently, but is personally unostentatious.

Free Masonry Defended.

At a thanksgiving supper given by Due Guard lodge, number 278, F. & A. M., at Larwill, Indiana, Mr. E. L. McLallen, a prominent member of that lodge, and chairman of the Grand Lodge committee on foreign correspondence, delivered an address in which the following in defense of Masonry occurs:

"I have been informed that you have among you in this community some who, through ignorance and malice, would persuade the world that Free Masons and members of kindred societies were bad men, enemies of God, of religion and of law. I am told, too, that these misguided people profess the exhalted character of christianity. Shall I say what I think of this? Why not? Well, it is this, it is out of their power to damage us, unless we ourselves are to blame. I have observed that the world at large generally forms a pretty accurate estimate of a man's character no matter what his professions may be. Actions speak louder than words. If our life and conduct are according to masonic teachings, rest assured our left-handed friends will be unable to work us injury. Masonry has too often met the attacks of bigotry and narrow-mindedness. Masonry will survive all such shocks as this, for its root takes hold on the dearest and best impulses of humanity. It is the church that will suffer when these benighted creatures put on her livery to serve the devil in.

In the language of Reverend Father Taylor, 'May God in his infinite mercy grant that the time will soon come when the hearts of the enemies of Free Masonry shall become as soft as their heads.'

Because there are some Masons false to their obligations is no true stigma upon Masonry. Where is the mind so illogical, so illiberal as to guage thus? Shall the unseemly conduct of one, ten or an hundred become a reproach against a whole community? God forbid. If so, then law must be despised because there are to be found attorneys who are pettifoggers and barristers who are rapacious The healing art must be condemned because ignorant pretenders poison instead of healing. The whole system of business must be reckoned one of sharping because there are those who will deceive and cheat to get gain. All good men are not Masons, and it may be frankly admitted that all Masons are not good men, but this neither proves that Masonry is beneficial or harmful, as the same is true of all benevolent institutions. If we were to apply the square and plumb to the charitable institutions, or even to the orthodox churches which have been and are still doing such a noble work for the advancement of mankind intellectually, morally and spiritually—if we were to test them by these unyielding implements, excluding all imperfections and requiring exact measurements—I fear but few members would be left to pay their quarterage. Those who join us from bad or unworthy motives sadly misjudge and usually meet the discomfiture their folly justly merits. We conclude, then, that no man, whatever be his station in life or position in society, should be permitted to assume the obligations of our fraternity unless he be a man of heart—a heart in which dwells the fear of God—a man of generous impulses, broad benevolence and the virtues. I am reminded by this of the language used by the grand master of Canada on a recent occasion, 'Know ye that we are lawful Masons, obedient to the laws of our country—and established of old to do good to our brethren, to be serviceable to our fellow-men, and to fear God, the architect of the universe. We have amongst us concealed from the eyes of all men, secrets which may not be divulged, and which have never yet been discovered; these secrets are lawful and honorable, and not repugnant to the laws of God or man. They were entrusted to our forefathers in the ancient times, and have been faithfully transmitted to us. It is therefore our duty to convey them unimpaired to posterity. Unless our craft were good and our calling honorable we should not have had a continuous existence during so many centuries, nor should we have been honored by the fellowship of the great men of all ages, who have ever been willing to promote our objects and protect us in times of temporary adversity.'

Free and accepted Masonry has always affirmed the essential principle of religious toleration; it has always avowed and asserted the sanctity of the individual conscience, and the right of private judgment in all matters of human thought and conviction, and thus led the growing sentiment of the world that the spirit of man is of more consequence than the name he goes by. In free and accepted Masonry there is neither Jew nor Gentile, but equal children of one impartial Father.

What, then, is the injunction to each and every one of our fraternity? To show ourselves men—thank God as I do from the bottom of my heart of hearts that there is one institution that is not sectarian, that is not partisan, that thinks not of nationality, that thinks not of color, cares neither for differences of tongue nor distinction of caste; but looks beyond under the clothes, under the skin, at THE MAN.

Such being the principle underlying our fraternity, it behooves its members to look well to their ways, and conform to the line of duty and fidelity with our obligations to God, to our brethren to mankind and to ourselves.

I do not conceive it necessary at this late day, when for more than three thousand years our altar-fires have been kept so brightly burning, that should I pronounce a eulogy upon Masonry, to my brethren, I should say its deeds are impressed upon your minds, its virtues are registered in your hearts. To you who have passed its portals, surely no voice of mine is needed to strengthen your devotion, to stimulate your zeal, or to fire your ambition. The most perfect man is he who does his duty most faithfully to God, to his country, to his neighbor and to himself."

Pause, Ponder and Peruse!

The invention of that Superior and Complete Sewing Machine (The Family Sewing Machine), marks one of the most important eras in the history of machinery and when we consider its great usefulness and extremely low price ($25). it is very difficult to conceive of any invention for domestic use of more or even equal importance to families. It has great capacity for work; beautiful, smooth, and quiet movement, rapid execution, certainty and delightful ease of operation, that at once commends it above all others The working parts are all steel, strong and durable, and will last a life time; the bobbins hold 100 yards of thread; the stitch is the firmest of all the stitches made, neat and regular, and can be regulated in a moment to sew stitches from an inch in length on coarse material down to the finest, so infinitesimal as to be hardly discernable with the naked eye, and with a rapidity rendering it impossible to count them as fast as made; it has more attachments than any other, and it does to perfection all kinds of heavy, coarse, plain, fine, or fancy needle-work with ease, and far less labor than required on other machines. It needs no commendation, the rapid sales, increasing demand and voluntary encomiums from the press, and the thousands of families who use them, amply testify to their undoubted worth as a standard and reliable house-hold necessity, extending its popularity each day. Machines sent anywhere to be examined before any money is paid. Agents wanted by the Company, Address them for information. Family Sewing Machine Co., 755 Broadway, New York. 43-1y.

THE NEW STYLE

$25 FAMILY SEWING MACHINE.

THE USUAL $65 MACHINE REDUCED TO $25.

$150 per Week Made Easy.

Horse and Wagon Free to Agt's

The CHEAPEST and BEST in the World.

Too Long in Use to Doubt its Superior MERITS

No Money to Pay until Machine is Delivered to you and Examined.

It makes the shuttle, double-thread, lock-stitch, (the same on both sides of the work), which received the highest reward at the Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia, Pa., 1876. And is complete with a larger assortment of attachments for fine work than any other machine, and reduced to only $25.

It is an easy and pleasant machine to operate, requires the least care, produces every variety of work, and will last until the next century begins. Strong, simple, rapid and efficient.

Use it once and you will use no other. The money cheerfully refunded if it will not outwork and outlast any machine at double the price.

Agents sell them faster than any other in consequence of their being the "best at the lowest price."

Each machine throughly warranted with written guarantee for five years. Kept in order free of charge; money refunded at once if not satisfactory.

It is the most solid, reliable, and satisfactory machine ever invented for all kinds of family work. It is an acknowleged unequivocal mechanical success, thoroughly tested and used in thousands of homes. An efficient, silent, rapid, reliable and ever-ready helper to the weary wife or seamstress, it will do the work of a family for a lifetime, or it will earn from $4 to $5 per day for any one who wishes to sew for a living. This machine costs less than half the price of any new machine of like quality. Has extra long, large-sized shuttle, easily removed. Extra large-sized bobbins, holding 100 yards of thread, doing away with the frequent rewinding of bobbins. It is built for strength and constant, hard work. Interchangeable working parts, manufactured of fine polished steel. Will run for years without repairs, is simple to learn, easy to manage, understood perfectly in an hour, and always ready in a moment to do every description of heavy or fine work, at less cost or trouble than any other machine at any price ever did or can do. It will sew anything a needle can pierce, from lace or cambric to heavy cloth or harness, with any kind of thread, and will run off twenty yards per minute; it uses strong, straight needles and never breaks them It cannot miss or drop a stitch, ravel or break the thread. If you have any other machine, buy this and have a better one. The ease and rapidity of its motion and quality of its work, are its best recommendations. It will hem, fell, tuck, braid, cord, bind, gather, quilt, ruffle, pleat, fold, scallop, shirr, roll, baste, embroider, run up braids, etc., with elegance, ease and quickness, unsurpassed by any machine ever invented.

BEWARE OF IMPOSITION.

The price for our new machines are less than those asked by dealers in second-hand, rebuilt and refinished machines, or those selling out old stock to close up business, many such inferior and old style machines being offered as new at reduced prices; beware of imposition and only buy new machines. There are no new first-class machines offered as low as the "FAMILY," by many dollars.

Machines Sent for Examination Before Payment of Bill.

Extraordinary inducements offered to clergymen, teachers, storekeepers, etc., to act as agents. Horse and wagon furnished free. For testimonials see descriptive books, mailed free with samples of work, liberal terms, circulars, etc. Address,

THE ECLIPSES OF 1880.

In the year 1880 there will be six eclipses, four of the sun and two of the moon.

A total eclipse of the sun, January 11, invisible in the eastern portion of the United States. The partial and total phases may be visible, though under unfavorable conditions, through portions of Utah, Nevada and California.

A total eclipse of the moon, June 22, invisible in the eastern portion of the United States. Observers on the Pacific coast may see the eclipse for about half an hour before the moon sets.

An annular eclipse of the sun, July 7, invisible throughout North America. It will be visible in South America and the southern part of Africa.

A partial eclipse of the sun, December 1, visible only in the southern hemisphere.

A total eclipse of the moon, December 16, invisible in the eastern portion of the United States, but some of its phases visible on the Pacific coast.

A partial eclipse of the sun, December 31, visible in the eastern portion of the United States and at Chicago, from 6:15 to 7:44 in the morning.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

A DISPATCH from Gloucester, Mass., says the fishing schooner Andrew Leighton, with a crew of fourteen men, is believed to have been lost in the recent gale.

AN accident in a coal mine at Pottsville, Pa., resulted in the killing of two men and a boy.....New Yorkers are agitating the project of a street railway on Broadway. ....Amos Tuck, a member of Congress from New Hampshire from 1847 to 1853, and also a member of the celebrated Peace Convention in 1861, has just died at his home in Exeter, N. H.....A New York theater door-keeper has been arrested for refusing admission to a colored man....The town of Bed Rock, Pa., has been almost wholly destroyed by fire.

TWO OF the murderers of Joseph F Frye, of Boston, having pleaded guilty, were sentenced to the penitentiary for life.

GEN. GRANT arrived at Philadelphia on the morning of the 16th of December, thus fully completing his journey around the world. He was met at the depot by the city official, and an immense concourse of people. After a speech of welcome by Mayor Stokely, he was escorted to the State House, where he reviewed the procession, a monster affair that occupied several hours in passing. In the evening the General dined with George W. Childs, of the Philadelphia Ledger.

THE WEST.

EX-PRESIDENT GRANT was accorded an enthusiastic reception by the people of Cincinnati, on the 11th inst. The city was gayly decorated, and the citizens were full of enthusiasm.

THE Adams-Hatch Peace Commission ended its sittings at Los Pinos, Col., last week. It recommends, among other things, that the White River Agency be abolished, and the Utes of the agency be distributed between Los Pinos and the Southern Agency; that the loss of property occasioned by the outbreak be paid for out of the Ute fund now on deposit at Washington, and the portion of the reservation formerly occupied by the White River Utes be ceded to the Government.

A BLIZZARD of unusual severity swept over Dakota and Minnesota last week. The snow-fall was not very great, but the wind piled the flakes up in mountainous heaps, leaving exposed places bare. At Morris drifts seven feet deep were blown up, and then blown away again to other places. At Fargo and Moorehead there were drifts as high as the eaves of many of the houses.

GEN. GRANT left Cincinnati on the morning of Friday, the 12th inst., and journeyed to Columbus, Ohio, where he was accorded a most enthusiastic reception, the day's festivities winding up with a grand banquet. At 12 o'clock the General bid the Columbians good-by, boarded a train, and sped away toward the East. The city of Pittsburgh was reached on the morning of Saturday, the 13th, where another big reception was tendered the distinguished traveler. ....At Plattsmouth, Neb., nine railroad laborers were buried beneath a bank of earth they were excavating. Two were taken out dead, and all the others were more or less injured.

A BILLION AND A HALF feet of lumber was received at Chicago during the year 1879....Over 200 North Carolina negroes arrived in Indianapolis one day last week, hungry, half-naked, and moneyless. They were lodged in the colored churches, and solicitors were sent out to collect funds and secure homes for them.

GEN. CROOK nearly lost his life while hunting wild geese, his hands and feet having been frozen in a Nebraska "blizzard."....A man was recently killed near Kansas City by an aerolite....A young man named Abies, living near Mendota, Ill., was strangled to death by a grain of corn which accidentally got into his windpipe.

A YOUNG man from Pleasant Ridge, Ohio, entered a Cincinnati dissecting-room, the other day, in search of the remains of his mother, which had been stolen by grave-robbers, and found the corpse on a table and two promising students in the act of sawing the old lady's head off....Chicago papers chronicle the death of Judge Buckner S. Morris, an old citizen and prominent lawyer. He was Mayor of the city forty-five years ago. Judge Morris was a native of Kentucky, and was 80 years old....The boiler in Louis Trumbull's saw-mill at Collins, Ind., exploded last week, killing Trumbull, his two sons, and two other persons employed in the mill....Chicago elevators contain 6,549,665 bushels of wheat, 2,554,679 bushels of corn, 1,096,118 bushels of oats, 260,802 bushels of rye and 707,897 bushels of barley, making a grand total of 11,149,161 bushels, against 8,613,579 bushels at this period last year.

THE SOUTH.

A CONGRESSIONAL committee will go to Louisiana and make a personal inspection of the Eads jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi river....A petition in chancery has been filed at New Orleans to annul Mrs. Dorsey's bequest to Jefferson Davis.

A FEW weeks ago a Deputy United States Marshal undertook to arrest some persons charged with defrauding the revenues in Northern Texas. He was resisted and himself arrested. Subsequently he obtained military assistance and arrested eleven men. They have just been discharged, the Grand Jury finding no bill against them, and the United States District Attorney has called for the Deputy Marshal's removal. The army officers who aided in making the arrests have been indicted for their part in the proceedings.

COL. W. R. GOOS, a noted counterfeiter, was recently killed at his house, near Nicholasville, Ky. He opened the door with a pistol in his hand, when he was immediately shot through the heart. He was Colonel of a Kentucky regiment in the Union army during the war.

GENERAL.

A WOMAN and her two children were drowned while attempting to cross a river on the ice, near Ottawa, Canada....Gen. Eckert has resigned the Presidency of the Atlantic and Pacific Telegraph Company.

DELEGATES to a convention called to organize the American Agricultural Society met in New York city last week. There was a good attendance, and a variety of interesting topics were discussed, and a number of valuable papers read. John Merriman, of Maryland, was elected permanent President of the society, and a list of Vice Presidents, representing every State in the Union, was chosen. A Board of Directors, consisting of nineteen, five of them to serve for one year, seven for two years, and seven for three years, was elected.

GEN. GRANT'S reception by the people of Pittsburgh was a big demonstration—only little less in the number of the people and the length of the procession than the Chicago affair, but far exceeding it in gush and enthusiasm, according to all accounts. The notable feature of the Pittsburgh reception, and the one most likely to be remembered and recalled, was the speech of Gen. Grant in reply to some remarks of Prof. Fulton, the spokesman of the principals of the public schools who called upon him in a body. The General's speech, which was much longer than usual, and which is apt to become as memorable in a certain sense as the famous Des Moines speech, was as follows:

GENTLEMEN: There is no interest in our country which I feel deserves more to be fostered than that of the public school. Intelligence is the security of the republic, as ignorance is the upholder of monarchy. To insure ourselves against the disasters of war, particularly of civil war, we want education diffused, that the minds of our youth may be sufficiently taught to read and to distinguish between right and wrong, and with such education universally diffused the republic can never be in danger. I only regret that the statistics show in our country so much illiteracy as is shown. I was surprised at some figures that I heard repeated within a few days; but, when we consider the infancy of our public-school system, it is probably not so much to be wondered at. My hope is that the day will come, and that not far distant, when the school facilities everywhere will be so that every child may have the opportunity of receiving a common-school education at the expense of the State, and, if it should be necessary, that there should be in each State of this Union a compulsory education. It would be impossible, I suppose, with our views of State rights (which I would separate altogether from State sovereignty)—it would be impossible for the General Government to demand a compulsory school system in the States. But the General Government, so long as it has public lands, might, if it chose, contribute public lands, or in any other way might contribute to the support of free schools in the country, and make any condition that the General Government thought advisable before a State could receive the benefit which the General Government was going to bestow, and in that way indirectly have a part in the compulsory education that I speak of. Of course, you understand that I say the State could be the only authority to compel education within the state, but the General Government, giving its assistance, could come in on condition that the State afford the facilities which every child requires for a common-school education.

Gentlemen, I hope your efforts here in Allegheny county will be imitated all over this broad land, and that in a few years we may see, if not a universal, at least a very general, attendance of the children upon our public schools.

THE bark Monrovia has just sailed from New York for Monrovia, Liberia, with another cargo of negro emigrants for the republic of Liberia. They were picked up by agents of the American Colonization Society in all the principal cities of the South, many of them coming from North Carolina.

THERE is trouble with the Indians in British Columbia, where the pure-bloods and half-breeds have made common cause against the settlers, killing the Government Agent and murdering several white people....The steamer City of Berlin, which arrived at New York last week, from Liverpool, was lighted, during her voyage, by electricity. Four lights were placed in the saloon and two in the steerage, each having a light power of 400 standard candles, the apparatus being driven by a small four-horse-power engine. The experiment proved a great success.

REV. E. D. WINSLOW, the Boston forger, is said to be in Buenos Ayres, South America, publishing a paper under an assumed name and attending church and Sunday school with his old-time regularity.

WASHINGTON.

JUDGE MCCRARY, late of the War Department, took leave of the Cabinet one evening last week, at a dinner at the White House, and left, soon after, for St. Louis. Mr. Ramsey immediately entered upon his duties as Secretary of War.

IT is asserted by the friends of Judge Hunt, of the United States Supreme Court, that he will resign as soon as a bill is passed through Congress to enable him to take advantage of the Retirement law, by which those who have served ten continuous years and arrived at the age of 70 can be retired upon full pay.

THE Department of Agriculture report says of the condition of the cotton and corn crops, that the returns from correspondents for the month ending December substantially confirm the report of the month previous. The corn crop, during November, depreciated through the imperfect ripening in our heaviest corn-growing regions, the States north of the Ohio river and Missouri, some States falling off 10 per cent. This will reduce the average yield per acre of the whole country to 29.1 bushels, which is exceeded by only one former year—29.4 in 1875. This reduces the aggregate production about 55,000,000 bushels from the November figures, but still leaves the crop larger than in any previous year by over 150,000,000 bushels. The States and Territories west of the Mississippi river return over 100,000,000 bushels more than in 1878.

WASHINGTON advices report that the House Naval Committee has decided to report favorably upon the bill appropriating $50,000 in aid of the Howgate Arctic expedition....A joint resolution offered in the Senate by Mr. Morgan, of Alabama, provides that all railroads holding lands granted by Congress in aid of their construction, and which have failed to comply with the conditions upon which such grants were voted, shall forfeit these lands to the United States to be restored to the public domain open to settlement by pre-emption or homestead entry. The passage of this resolution would bring into market, subject to public settlement under the laws of the United States, an aggregate of nearly 130,000,000 acres of land....Senator Pendleton's Census bill provides for the striking out of the census act the clause requiring inquiry as to the ownership of the public debt of the United States. Also, to amend the act so that the enumeration shall commence the 1st day of June, instead of the first Monday in June, 1880, and shall end within two weeks thereafter.

POLITICAL.

AUGUSTA (Me.) dispatches of the 15th inst. assert that a count has been made by the Governor and Council of the election returns, which results in delivering certificates to a sufficient number of Democrats to give that party a majority in both branches of the Legislature. The dispatches state that "the Governor and Council count out three Senators from Cumberland, one each from York, Lincoln and Washington, and two from Androscoggin. The Democrats have a majority large enough in the House to give a quorum if none of the Republicans should appear and take their seats. They have thrown out Republican Representatives from Portland, Bath, Saco, Rockland and Lewiston, and other towns enough to make vacancies in fourteen Representative districts." The dispatches assert great feeling among the Republicans owing to this condition of affairs.

THE question at present agitating the Republicans of Indiana is their candidate for Governor next year. Among those proposed are Gen. James M. Shackelford, Gen. Morton C. Hunter, Gen. John Coburn and Col. William Williams.

IT is stated that a decision has been privately reached among the Democratic members of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections in favor of reporting a recommendation that Kellogg be unseated as Senator from Louisiana, and Spofford installed....Gen Mahone, Democrat and "Readjuster," has been elected to succeed Gen. Withers in the United States Senate from Virginia.

AN Associated Press dispatch from Augusta, Me., says: Full details of the count made by the Governor and Council show the following results: In the Senate the Fusionists are given 20 members; the Republicans 11. In the House the Fusionists have 78; the Republicans 61. Five cities with twelve Republican Representatives—Portland, Bath, Lewiston, Rockland and Saco—are without representation. The House will thus be twelve members short at its organization. The actual result of the election, according to the official returns before changed by the Council, was as follows: Senate—Republicans, 19; Fusionists, 12. House—Republicans, 90; Fusionists, 61. Net change in the Senate, 16; in the House, 46. By the election returns the Republicans had a majority of 36 on joint ballot. As counted by the Governor and Council the Fusionists have a majority of 26 on joint ballot. The Republicans claim the rejections and changes were wholly on technical grounds.

AT the meeting of the National Republican Committee, at Washington, on the 17th inst., it was decided that the convention in 1880 should be held at Chicago on the first Monday in June, the vote standing: Chicago, 24; Saratoga, 14, and Cincinnati and Indianapolis each 2. Senator J. Donald Cameron, of Pennsylvania, was elected Chairman over Mr. Averill, of Minnesota, who developed considerable strength; and Thomas B. Keogh, of North Carolina, Secretary, in place of Gov. McCormick, resigned.

THE Central Committee of the Greenback-Labor party of Illinois met at Chicago last week, and selected delegates to attend the Greenback-Labor Conference, to be held in Washington on the 8th of January.

FOREIGN.

GREAT BRITAIN and the continent of Europe have been experiencing some unusually severe winter weather. The cold was intense in Berlin; in Upper Silesia, where the famine prevails, the thermometer marked 12 degrees below zero Fahrenheit; so hard and continuous frosts so early in the season have not been experienced in Austria since 1838; the river Seine, in France, was frozen over for the first time since 1861.....The French Chamber of Deputies has passed a bill ordering the expenditure of 5,000,000 francs for the relief of workingmen in districts suffering from a depression of trade.

SINCE the attempt to blow him up at Moscow, the Czar has lost all desire to institute Governmental reforms, and fears are entertained at St. Petersburg that new and unusual repressive measures will be undertaken at an early day....The scheme for a universal exhibition in Berlin will have to be abandoned, the Government having refused to lend its aid to the undertaking.

AT Calcutta, India, an assassin made a murderous attack on Lord Lytton, the Viceroy of India. Two shots were fired at him, both of which fortunately missed....A severe battle has been fought near Cabul between the British and a force of 10,000 Afghan Sepoys, resulting in the defeat of the latter, with heavy loss....Fearful inundations, resulting in a vast destruction of property, are reported in Transylvania, a province of Austria....In Ireland, a Grand Jury has returned true bills against Davitt, Killen and Daly, and they will be tried for sedition at Dublin....Several arrests of parties suspected of complicity in the attempted assassination of the Czar have been made in Russia, but the ringleaders are still at large....A man has been arrested in St. Petersburg who apparently intended to create a commotion at the Czar's winter palace, as he had in his possession a complete plan of that vast establishment and a number of dynamite cartridges, electric batteries, etc.

LATE advices from South America report that an engagement took place at Tarapaca, 2,500 Chilians being routed with a loss of 1,000 men and several guns....It is considered settled that the prosecution against Davitt, Daly and Killen, the Irish agitators, will not be proceeded with by the British Government....Advices from Afghanistan to Dec. 14 state that on the 13th the British forces in Cabul, under Gen. Baker, captured the heights of Bala-Hissar, where the citadel of the capital is located, after a short engagement. The day before Gen. MacPherson attempted to drive the Afghans from their positions, but failed.

DISPATCHES from Cabul of Dec. 15 report the situation as serious in the extreme. The Sepoys and hill-men who menace the city are increasing in numbers rapidly, and it is estimated that they now number not less than from 12,000 to 15,000 fighting men. The British have lost heavily, especially of officers. Reinforcements are on the way, but it is feared they will be intercepted and cut to pieces by the enemy, in which event the British will be driven within the walls of Cabul and compelled to stand a siege.

TWO ENGLISH travelers have been captured in Epirus by Greek brigands, who demand a ransom of £4,000....In Limerick county, Ireland, an evicted tenant, with a cudgel, felled to the floor Lord Fermoy, who remained senseless for a time. The assailant was immediately seized and taken to prison.... A letter from Vera Sassulitch explains that her attempt to kill Trepoff, the St. Petersburg Chief of Police, was made under orders from the Revolutionary Committee, and not, as was urged by the defense at her trial, from personal indignation at the cruelties to political prisoners.

SOUTH AMERICAN advices report a battle between the allies, numbering 12,000, and the Chilian forces, resulting in a disastrous defeat to the allies....A famine is reported in Armenia, in Asiatic Turkey. Great distress is also reported among the poor of Italy, Hungary and portions of Germany.... By the explosion of a salt mine in Wurtemburg, Germany, twelve persons were instantly killed and six fatally injured.

DISPATCHES from Cabul of the 18th of December report the city completely in the hands of the natives, Gen. Roberts' forces, numbering about 5,000, having retired to the fortifications two miles north of the town, where they were menaced by a native force of 30,000. Gen. Roberts' communication with the outside world was completely severed, and the British, largely outnumbered, were confined entirely to defensive operations. The situation was regarded as extremely grave.... The celebrated decision in the case of William M. Tweed, on the question of cumulative sentence, is said to have induced the English Attorney General to reopen the case of Arthur Orton, the Tichborne claimant, who was sentenced in the same manner as the late New York boss. ....The evicted tenant who assaulted Lord Fermoy in Limerick, the other day, has been sentenced to five years' penal servitude. The severity of the penalty causes great indignation in Ireland.

CONGRESSIONAL SUMMARY.

MR. Allison, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported to the Senate, on the 11th inst. the resolution that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to negotiate, through a commission of five persons, with the Ute Indians for their removal from Colorado. The resolution passed, with an amendment by Mr. Cockrell that the Indians shall not be settled in the Indian Territory. In executive session, John Hay, of Ohio, was confirmed as Assistant Secretary of State, and Henry Harmon, of New Hampshire, as Deputy Second Auditor of the Treasury. The President nominated ex-Representative James S. Sener, of Virginia, to be Chief Justice of Wyoming Territory. A memorial was presented from a Commodore of the navy, proposing the establishment of a confederacy of all the Governments on this continent. The bill appropriating $200,000 for military posts on the Rio Grande was passed. The Senate adjourned at 2 o'clock until Monday.... In the House, the bill allowing for loss, by leakage or casualty, of spirits withdrawn from distillery warehouses for exportation was passed. The Invalid Pension Appropriation bill was reported and recommitted. It calls for $32,400,000, or $3,000,000 more than last year. Mr. Townsend, of Illinois, offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the number of licensed dealers in leaf-tobacco, and the amount of internal revenue collected from them during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879; and Mr. Manning called for information in regard to fraudulent claims paid by the treasury. Mr. Converse, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill amending an act to grant additional rights to homestead settlers on public lands within railroad limits. Under that act homesteaders who occupied eighty acres were authorized to select eighty additional acres without payment of registry fees. The present bill simply provides that the registry fees should be paid for. The bill was passed. Mr. Shelley offered a preamble and resolution reciting that a large number of citizens of certain States have been induced through false representations and machinations to leave their homes for the purpose of emigrating to other States, and that they have failed for want of funds to reach their destination, and are without food or proper clothing, and providing for the appointment of a select committee of five to investigate the causes of such emigration, to sit during the recess, and report such measures as the exigency may require.

Bills were introduced in the House (the Senate not being in session) on the 12th inst.: By Mr. Gibson, for the appointment of an inter-oceanic commission to determine the best plan and route for the establishment of a communication for trade and commerce between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans across the isthmus of Darien; by Mr. Gillette, in opposition to the retirement of greenbacks, and in favor of substituting them for national-bank notes, and for the free coinage of silver. Mr. Morton presented a memorial from sugar refiners for the revision of the sugar tariff. Mr. Baker, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the Fortification and Pensions Appropriation bills, and they were passed. The remainder of the session was consumed upon private bills. Adjourned till Monday.

The Senate reassembled after a short recess on Monday, Dec. 15, when Mr. Voorhees presented a petition of 7,000 ex-soldiers and sailors, praying to be paid the difference between the value of greenbacks in which they were paid for services to the Government and the value of gold at the time of payment. Mr. Butler introduced an amendment to the Bayard resolution on the currency. Bills introduced: By Mr. McMillan, to authorize the St. Paul and Chicago Short-Line Railway Company to construct a bridge across Lake St. Croix; by Mr. Vest, organizing of the Territory of Oklahoma out of the present Indian Territory; by Mr. Saunders, making Omaha a port of entry. Mr. Saunders, from the Committee on Territories, reported a substitute for the bill to extend the northern boundary of Nebraska....In the House, among the bills introduced were two by Mr. Morse for the encouragement of American shipbuilding and manufactures, and for the appointment of a commission to ascertain and report a basis for a reciprocity treaty between the United States and the British provinces; by Mr. Mitchell, to prohibit "omnibus" legislation, providing that no bill except the General Appropriation bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, and that no Appropriation bill shall embrace legislation not directly relating to the subject-matter of the appropriation; by Mr. Clardy, providing for the payment of arrears of pensions to the widows and to minor children of persons who died of injuries received in the late war; by Mr. De La Matyr, for the establishment of a branch mint in Indianapolis; by Mr. Wells, for the establishment of a mint in St. Louis; by Mr. Chalmers, to encourage the education of the colored race; by Mr. Hill, granting bounty lands to soldiers of the United States who served in the war of 1861; by Mr. Samford, to regulate the manner of counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States. A long discussion ensued upon the bill for the settlement of outstanding claims against the District, but no action was reached.

A bill to donate twelve condemned bronze cannon to the Francis P. Blair Monument Association at St. Louis passed the Senate Dec. 16, as did bills allowing for loss by leakage on spirits withdrawn from warehouse for exportation; the bill limiting the time for prosecutions for desertion from the army; and the bill allowing applications and affidavits required for the obtainment of patents for mineral lands to be made by agents of non-residents. Bills were introduced: Placing the names of all disabled soldiers on the pension roll; declaring the Ute Indians public enemies, and their treaty rights forfeited, unless within thirty days they surrender the persons engaged in the White river murders; to appropriate certain unclaimed pay and bounty to the education of the colored people; to relieve the Treasurer of the United States from the amount now charged to him and deposited with the several States. Mr. Booth introduced a bill appropriating $20,000 for a statue to Prof. Joseph Henry. The Senate, in executive session, confirmed the appointment of Edward Guthridge, United States Attorney for the Eastern district of Texas, and Joseph B. Leake for the Northern district of Illinois; also Charles Lehman, Collector of Customs for the district of Vicksburg....In the House a resolution for the appointment of a committee upon the inter-oceanic canal was adopted. Bills were introduced: By Mr. Willet, prohibiting the impaneling of polygamists on juries in trials for offenses against the anti-polygamy law, and prohibiting men and women who are practicing polygamy from voting; by Mr. Bragg, revoking the findings of the court martial in the case of Fitz John Porter, and restoring him to the army as Colonel, with all arrearages as Major General until Sept. 1, 1866, and as Colonel thereafter. Bills passed: Restoring to the public domain part of the military reservation of Fort Ripley, Minn.; confirming grants of swamp lands to Minnesota; abolishing the military reservations of Forts Abercrombie, Seward and Ransom, Dakota Territory.

Mr. Eaton introduced a bill in the Senate, Dec. 17, to create a tariff commission; Mr. Morgan a resolution in favor of maintaining the present volume and legal-tender quality of greenbacks and providing that the coinage of silver shall be equal to that of gold; Mr. Davis, of West Virginia, a bill to repeal certain permanent appropriations. Mr. Morgan made a long speech in support of his resolution on introducing it. Mr. Thurman presented a memorial upon the subject of contagious diseases of stock. Mr. Pendleton, from the Committee on Census, reported a bill upon the tenth enumeration. Resolutions were presented by Mr. Morgan restoring railroad lands to the public domain; by Mr. Call, to repeal the section of the Revised Statutes prohibiting the payment of any claims against the Government which occurred prior to 1861 in favor of any person who engaged in the late war; by Mr. Groome, authorizing the appointment of a Panama Canal Committee. A bill was presented by Mr. Eaton, authorizing the appointment of a Tariff Commission. The Senate then held a short executive session, and, when the doors were reopened, passed, among others, the bill to authorize the free entry of competitive prizes won by American citizens to foreign countries....In the House, Mr. Ballou offered two bills, one making gold and silver the only legal tender, and the other repealing the stamp tax on bank checks. Mr. McCoid, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment giving Congress the power to grant, protect and regulate the exclusive right to adopt and use trade-marks, which was discussed at great length and referred to the Judiciary Committee. Bills were passed: Exempting postal employes from serving on juries; for the appointment of a joint committee of three Senators and five Representatives to investigate the present system of salaries, fees and emoluments allowed to officers of the several United States courts; providing for United States courts at Columbus, Ohio; and the Military Academy Appropriation bill. Mr. Conger offered a resolution, which was adopted, asking for information respecting the operation of the life-saving service on the great lakes.

ENGLAND'S OLD NOBILITY.

How the Great Land Owners Obtained Their Estates.

The London Echo has been publishing an interesting series of articles entitled "Our Old Nobility," in which the growth of the noble families of England has been portrayed. In a concluding article the writer thus sums up his views:

In 100 chapters we have briefly sketched the agrarian history of a majority of our most notable aristocratic houses. In my selections I have not been guided mainly by the greatness of their possessions, but rather by their historic interest or present prominence. Thus I have included some like the Erskines and Fanes, whose estates are small, and have altogether omitted peers like Lord Tredegar, with over 100,000 acres, and Lord Penrhyn, with a rent-roll of £66,000. I have dealt in all with 121 nobles, owning nearly 5,500,000 of acres, with a rent-roll of nearly £5,750,000, an average ownership of 45,000 acres, and an average rent-roll of over £46,000.

It certainly has not been my object to seek out examples of what, for want of a better word, I will call the illegitimate acquisition of landed property. Yet the result is that those who can claim that they have obtained their lands by money solely acquired in commercial or professional pursuits are singularly few—perhaps about a dozen in all. Compared with other peoples, we are a landless nation, and we are a landless nation in consequence of continued encroachment upon the rights our ancient forefathers possessed. Throughout the reigns of the Hanoverian Kings landowners' Parliaments were constantly passing Inclosure acts, desirable for the most part, with a view to increase production, but resulting in the appropriation of between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000 acres of common land, of which the common people retained but a very small proportion—not more than 750,000 acres in all. Occasionally I have been able to point out where vast estates have been increased by these acts, but generally it has been impossible to obtain exact information.

It is worthy of note that anciently the lavish grants of the crown were checked by the power of resumption. Most of the vast estates seized and retained by William the Conqueror were dissipated by William Rufus, who was compelled subsequently to resume the grant which he had made. About the middle of last century the grasping avarice of one of the Lowthers, in attempting to obtain for himself a large tract of crown lands, which had been previously granted to the Bentincks, occasioned the passage of what is known as the Nullus Tempus act, which secured the grantees of crown lands against any resumption of their properties. It is obviously impossible to reckon up acre by acre the quantity of land which has at various times been obtained otherwise than by purchase. The agrarian history of many of the great houses is complicated by the acquisition of property by marriage. I have, however, traced the previous history of such lands in a sufficient number of cases to show that we may safely presume that, as a rule, they have been acquired in much the same way as the rest. After a careful consideration of all the houses I have noticed, bear in mind the modern Inclosure act, and the increased value of lands due to the improvement of tenants, I cannot yet arrive at the conclusion that not one-tenth of the estates in question have been acquired for value received. All the rest, in one way or another, has been obtained for nothing.

Growth of European Cities.

The Registrande of the Prussian Etat Major has brought together some interesting statistics as to the growth of European cities. London, of course, comes first with its 958,802 inhabitants in 1801, grown to about 4,000,000 at the present day. Paris, in 1817, had 714,000 inhabitants, and in 1876, 1,998,000, not counting the numerous faubourgs. Berlin has greatly increased since 1810, when it had 163,000 of a population; now it has about 1,000,000. The city which has made the greatest proportional progress in recent years is Hanover, which between 1867 and 1875 grew from a population of 74,000 to one of 107,000, or 44 per cent. of increase. In the same time Stuttgart gained 41½ per cent.; Leipsic, 40 per cent.; Bremen and Berlin, 38 per cent.; Frankfort-on-the-Main, 31 per cent.; St. Etienne-en-Forez, 30 per cent.; Breslau, 28 per cent.; Dresden, 26 per cent.; Hull, 25 per cent.; Antwerp, 24 per cent.; Leeds, 22 per cent.; Glasgow, 21 per cent.; Edinburgh and Hamburg; 20 per cent.; Sheffield, 19 per cent.; Bristol, 18 per cent.; Copenhagen, Liege and Vienna, 16 per cent.; Koenigsberg, 15 per cent.; Palermo, 14 per cent.; Munich, Rotterdam and The Hague, 13 per cent.; London and Brussels, 12 per cent.; Bordeaux and Ghent, 11 per cent.; Paris, Nantes and Stockholm, 9 per cent.; Amsterdam and Cologne, 8 per cent.; Venice and Birmingham, 7 per cent.; Prague and Lyons, 6 per cent. No account is taken of the towns of Russia, Spain, Portugal and Turkey, on which anything like accurate information is wanting.

Yellow Fever.

The committee appointed by the President to proceed to Cuba for the purpose of collecting information in relation to the yellow fever has submitted a preliminary report to the National Board of Health. The report says:

"The most general result is that yellow fever habitually prevails in every place in Cuba from which reports were received, provided these places were of any size or commercial importance, and contain any considerable number of unacclimated persons to furnish food for widespread poison. In this particular the medical authorities, as well as the intelligent residents of Cuba, have for the most part misled the profession. Before leaving the United States most absolute assurances were given by natives or ex-residents of Cuba, and even in Cuba itself these assurances were confidently repeated, that yellow fever never occurred in this, that or the other place. Diligent inquiry was made for all such accessible places, and diligent investigation invariably proved that these assurances were false, and that they were founded upon the comparatively slight prevalence of the disease due in a large measure to the small number of unacclimated visitors or residents at such places. Detailed reports of these facts are possessed in abundance. It is very certain that the prevalence of yellow fever is not equally marked in all places. This varies greatly in different places, and in different years at the same places, and this variation is at times independent, apparently, of the amount of unacclimated material."

The Probable Cradle of Our Race.

The most probable conjecture has fixed the cradle of our race in that corner of land which lies westward the steep range of the Beloot Tagh mountains, an offshoot of the Himalayas, and northward from the high, barren land of Kabul. This country, the ancient Bactriana, is the most habitable district to be found anywhere in Central Asia. There the hills stretch out in gentle slopes toward the west, and inclose fertile valleys, whose innumerable streams, fed by the mountains east and south, all go to swell the waters of the Oxus, now called the Jihon. Further north lies another fruitful country, watered by the Jaxartes, separated from the first by a range of hills much inferior to those which divide both lands from Yarkand and Kashgar on the east, and from Kabul on the south. Both the great rivers empty themselves into the sea of Aral, between which and the Caspian, sharply cutting off the fertile country from that sea, stretches the Khiva desert, a barren land affording a scanty nourishment to the herds of wandering Turkic tribes. There is good reason to believe, however, that this desert did not always exist, but that in times not extraordinarily remote the Caspian sea, joined to the Sea of Aral, extended over a much larger area than it at present covers; it is known even now to be sinking steadily within its banks. With such a contraction of the great sea the desert would grow by a double process, by the laying bare its sandy bed, and by the withdrawal of a neighboring supply of moisture from the dry land. So it may well have been that the fruitful territory wherein in remotest ages were settled our Aryan ancestors stretched so far west as to border upon a large inland Asiatic sea. It has even been conjectured that the turning of so much fertile land into desert was the proximate cause of those migrations which sent the greater part of the Aryian races westward—to people, at last, all the countries of Europe. The root which is common to the European languages for the names of the sea means, in the Indian and Iranian languages, a desert; how can we account for this fact better than by supposing that after the European nations had left their early home their brethren, who had remained behind and who, long afterward, separated into the peoples of India and Persia, came to know as a desert the district which their fathers had once known as the sea?—The Contemporary Review.

No More Sour Milk.

Herr Maurice Phillip, of Zurich, Switzerland, has found out how to preserve milk for an indefinite period. He placed a sample of the preserved milk at the disposal of the Agricultural Association of Zurich four months ago, and they have been testing away at that milk ever since without finding any perceptible change in its good qualities. A commission analyzed the milk, but could find nothing in it that should not be in pure milk. Herr Phillip proposes to supply London and Paris with milk from Switzerland. Instead of getting milk in a pitcher, the city persons will get a week's supply in an enamel-lined keg or barrel. If this can be successfully and economically done in Europe, it will soon cross the Atlantic and become a fixed American fact.

"LORENA," the heroine of the song of that name, so popular twenty years ago, is now the wife of an ex-Judge, both residing in Europe, and Mr. Webster, the writer, is a minister in Neenah, Wis.

THE American horses in England are preparing for a still more vigorous campaign next year than they waged the present, having received large reinforcements. For the 2,000-guineas race, which occurs at the Newmarket first spring meeting, 1880, besides Mr Lorillard's seven entries, which sound like an Indian invasion—Iroquois, Paw Paw, Santee, Merrimac, Wyandotte, Passaic, and Dakota—Mr. J. R. Keene has four entries, and Mr. Sanford has two. Out of this baker's dozen there should be some American starters.

A YOUNG hopeful in McCracken county, Ky., attended his mother's second wedding the other day, which had been planned without consulting him. The ceremony was half finished when the boy, who is 12 years old, approached the party who was being made his step-father and gave him a blow with a fire-shovel under the ribs that came near putting an end to the performance. The 'Squire had to stop until the mother administered a reprimand to the boy and took the shovel from him, when he began where he left off, and as quickly as possible prepared to leave the premises.

THE race of postal-cards around the world merely against time is becoming something of a nuisance to Postmasters. Some months ago one was sent forth on trial, and, having made the circuit of the globe, was returned to the sender expeditiously. The publication of the fact set on a great number of imitators. The latest person to fire a postal-card round the world and get the newspapers to note his achievement is one Frost, of New York; time as follows: New York, July 26; Marseilles, Aug. 8; Alexandria, Aug. 17; Suez, Aug. 21; Aden, Aug. 27; Bombay, Sept. 9; Calcutta, Sept. 12; Singapore, Sept. 26; Hong Kong, Oct. 2; San Francisco, Nov. 21; New York, Nov. 28.

THE bill to regulate railroad commerce between the States, introduced in the lower house of Congress by Mr. Sapp, of Iowa, embodies the principles contended for by Secretary McCrary when he was a Representative in Congress. It provides for a commission of nine, one from each judicial circuit of the United States, which shall fix maximum rates, and provides a penalty for any charge in excess of these rates, unless on an appeal to a United States court the railroad charge shall be decided not to be unreasonable. Provision is made for compelling railroad companies to exhibit their books, and the Commissioners are required to collect statistics for a Railroad Bureau at Washington.

TO BE fed on manna was the experience of the wanderers in the wilderness, but to be fed on rosebuds was the romantic fate of a number of convicts who escaped from the Nevada State prison a few winters ago. The fugitives sought safety in the forests of Mono county, where nestles a lake, until then nameless, but now known as Convict lake. Snow covered the ground and weighed down the trees. Around the lake, made warm by sulphur springs, the half-starved men found a few rosebuds and any number of rose-apples, and on the buds and fruit they managed to subsist until the Sheriff trailed them to their hiding-place. The convicts resisted with stones and clubs. A half-dozen men were killed, but finally the Sheriff's force made prisoners of the surviving desperadoes and took them to Mammoth City.

AFTER John E. Owens, the comedian, had retired to his chamber in the Palace Hotel, in San Francisco, the other night, he caught the sound of something crinoline in the hall and heard a gentle tap on the door of his room. He opened the door. He shut it again. For on the mat outside lay a pretty baby boy, who was crowing lustily. Pinned to the baby's clothing was the following note: "My Dear Sir: I have seen your performance of Higgins in 'Dr. Clyde,' and consider it one of the finest impersonations I ever witnessed. The only way in which I can evince my gratitude to you is by offering you one of the loveliest infants I could select from the orphan asylum. Take it and cherish it, and may God bless you and prosper you. AN UNKNOWN ADMIRER." Mr. Owens struggled with conflicting purposes for a few moments and then, summoning all of his friends that could be found, solemnly announced that baby's adoption as "John E. Owens, Jr."

PERSONS apparently in connection with the German Government repeat in the German press that the Russian troops situated in Poland and Lithuania have within the last few months been increased to something like 500,000 men. One-half of these are stationed in the kingdom of Poland, taking in flank the provinces of East Prussia, West Prussia, Silesia, and Posen, the other half being distributed between Riga and Kieff. According to the Molva, the leading financial paper of Russia, the last Eastern campaign cost the Czar 1,500,000,000 rubles and 200,000 lives. This is nearly twice as much as had been hitherto assumed.

THE corps of skaters, a force peculiar to the Norwegian army, has been lately recognized, and consists now of five companies, each of 110 men, which, in time of war, can be reinforced by calling in 270 skaters belonging to the landwehr. The men of this corps are armed with rifles, and can be maneuvered upon ice or over the snow-fields of the mountains with a rapidity equal to that of the best trained cavalry. The skates they use are admirably adapted for traveling over rough and broken ice or frozen snow, being six inches broad and between nine and ten inches long. In ascending steep slopes the men take a zig-zag course, tacking up the mountain side as a ship does against a head wind. As an instance of the speed at which they can go, it is mentioned that last winter a messenger dispatched from Roeraas at 3 o'clock in the morning arrived at Drontheim at 9:30 in the evening of the same day, having consequently accomplished 120 miles in eighteen and one-half hours.

ONE of the strangest cases of hydrophobia on record is reported from Buffalo. Some two years ago a lad named Frederick Meyers, while playing in the front yard of his parents' residence, was bitten by a large dog. Months passed, nothing transpired, and no effects of the injury were seen. Early in November last, however, it was noticed that the lad was acting strangely. He would crawl about on the floor, scratch on the carpet, and otherwise imitate a dog. Then he commenced to bark, and finally to froth at the mouth. Medical aid was summoned and the case was pronounced one of acute hydrophobia. Every possible effort in the power of physicians was made to stay the onward march of the poison, but to no purpose. The boy continued to grow worse; his eyes turned green, and he would fly at the cat, barking and growling like a canine. He was finally confined to bed, and it took the combined strength of three men to hold him there when the spells would come on. He is yet alive, but the doctors have given up all hope of his recovery. At every approach of a stranger he turns his eyes upon him and snarls.

A Fatal Box on the Ear.

The practice, which is sadly too prevalent among schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, of "boxing the ears" of their pupils has been frequently shown to be a dangerous one, and probably many more injuries result from it than are ever heard of or even suspected. A blow on the head may easily produce fatal injuries, and a lesson on this point well worth the attention of hasty-tempered teachers is conveyed by the evidence given in the case of a man who was tried this week at the Central Court for manslaughter. The case, as the counsel for the prosecution truly stated, was remarkable in its surgical aspects. The deceased man was a gate-keeper at some paper mills at Wandsworth. The prisoner went there on the 25th of August to seek employment. As he was coming out the deceased refused to let him pass through a gate known as the "traffic gate." The prisoner, however, watching his opportunity, managed to pass through the gate, and, as he did so, the deceased kicked him. The prisoner then struck the deceased, but whether with his fist or open hand was not clear. The deceased fell down, and although he bled from the mouth was able to give evidence against the prisoner on the 8th of September. He died, however, on the 15th of that month, his death resulting from hemorrhage caused by the severance of an artery in the mouth, and, strange to say, the artery had been divided by a piece of fractured bone, his jaw having been broken by the blow he had received from the prisoner. The jury having returned a verdict of guilty, the Judge said he would not inflict any punishment in the case, but simply directed the prisoner to enter into his own recognizance to come up for judgment when called on. In the meantime the story shows that a "box on the ear" may kill a man.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A Remarkable Ride.

A by-no-means indifferent performance was achieved in 1819 by Mr. Hutchinson, of Canterbury, who had backed himself to ride from Canterbury to London, just fifty-five and one-half miles, in three hours, employing horses belonging to himself and his friends, supplemented by some used in running the Wellington coach. The journey was divided into eleven stages, varying in length from five to six and a half miles, and was eventually got through in two hours, twenty-five minutes and fifty-one seconds, at an average rate of speed of a mile in two minutes and thirty-six seconds. Not at all bad work, considering what roads were sixty years ago, and that some time was lost in consequence of the horses bolting now and again. Mr. Hutchinson returned home by coach, reaching Canterbury—which he had left at 3:30 in the morning—a little before 3 in the afternoon, in good cue to enjoy the dinner provided by his admiring fellow-citizens, who furthermore showed their appreciation of his horsemanship by making him free of the city.—All the Year Round.

FARM NOTES.

HOGS may be kept from measles, trichinosis, etc, by mixing a handful of good wood ashes with their food twice a week.

THE United States buys more and more Canada horses yearly. In 1875 we imported only 214, valued at $28,955; while last year the number was 6,632, valued at $391,255.

A MARYLAND farmer thinks he has found a sure cure for the Canada thistle. It consists in sowing the land infested by them with buckwheat early in the spring, allowing it to grow till it is in full blossom, turning under and again reseeding with the same grain. The last crop is harvested when ripe.

THE Franklin (Mass.,) Farmers' Club have had a potato competition this year. All the contestants planted seed of Early Rose, and each chose his own mode of cultivation. A. W. Cheever got the largest yield, at the rate of 488 bushels per acre, by the use of stable-manure, 400 pounds of sulphate of potash, and about 800 pounds of guano per acre, spread over the furrows in which the potatoes are planted.

EGGS IN WINTER.—A writer in an agricultural journal has found out the secret of making hens lay in winter. He bought a lot of corn that had been damaged by fire, and fed it to his hens. He found that they laid wonderfully well all winter. Upon this hint he has since acted, and has found no difficulty in securing plenty of eggs in winter; keeping his fowls in good warm quarters, and feeding them largely with roasted or parched grain, principally corn.

CABBAGE WORMS. — We—Country Gentleman—have seen a statement in some of the papers that cabbages had been kept entirely clear of the insect by the aid of chickens, in a plantation of some thousands of plants. Screenings were first scattered to attract the fowls among the cabbages, and then, discovering the worms, they kept the patch clean. We have found this method to answer well, provided the chickens are not full grown; when older, they eat the cabbages. Young turkeys are still better; their keen eyes and quick motions allow nothing to escape. A member of the Elmira Farmers' Club kept his cabbages entirely free by cayenne pepper.

IMPROVE THE STOCK.—For about half the year we have to fodder cattle and sheep. Shall they grow while young steadily all the time till they are mature? Or, shall they be fed and sheltered by a straw stack or a rail fence just enough to hold them in place during winter and then do all their growing during a part of the warm months? As the country grows older, competition becomes greater in everything. It requires better management to make money. Poor stock, poorly managed, costs more than it will bring. Within a few years the prices of choice animals have declined, till they are within the reach of every man who keeps stock. Now is a good time to select a good, well-bred bull for use next season or later. The price will be lower now than in the spring when such animals are most salable. A thoroughbred male, of course, pays his way when used with pure-blooded females; but in a still more marked degree does he pay his way when used with grade or common stock. These are points which are well established beyond controversy.—Rural New Yorker.

ALL ABOUT MUCK.—Muck is the richness of the uplands washed by the annual rains down to the lowlands. It accumulates there, because it can get no lower, and coming down in a semi-liquid condition, as soon as it is at rest the sun evaporates the water from it, and leaves a—generally—black, unctous mass of soil, which is composed almost entirely of soluble material. Cultivating the uplands to exhaustive crops, and washing the remaining richness out by rains, soon renders such lands nearly barren. Digging out this deposit and hauling it to such fields as supplied it is merely restoring a runaway to its home. As the muck, in its passage down-hill, has lost the coarser parts of the original soil, which make a loose and porous seed-bed, it has become so solid, so compact, that the atmosphere is absolutely excluded, and the muck by itself is a mere paste, impervious to air, warmth, and all the invigorating influences of summer rains. To make it again soluable, then, it must not be merely carted out and spread over the field, but it must be mixed with the soil as deep as the roots require, by plowing, harrowing or shovel-plowing under. This process restores it to the place it occupied before the washing-out process took place, and, to enable us to do this cheaply, the unctous mass is dug out in the fall, piled up on a slope to drain, and left to freeze friable during the winter; then it will return to its proper place in the barren soil, and at once restore its original fertility.—Rural New Yorker.

Fight Between a Dog and a Donkey.

A singular encounter between a dog and a donkey has just occurred in Blackpool, England. A retired gentleman, named Weddington, owned a fine young donkey and a splendid mastiff. The other day the donkey was grazing in a field, when the dog rushed at it in a ferocious manner and fastened on to its nose. The donkey did not decline the challenge, for it at once shook the dog off, bit it about the head and shoulders, trampled on it, and tossed it about. The dog again seized the donkey, and a crowd soon gathered, but all efforts to separate the combatants were of no avail. The dog repeatedly fastened on the donkey's nose. Blood flowed profusely from both animals, and at the end of half an hour the owner appeared upon the scene and fresh attempts were made to part them, but without success. After the fight had lasted half an hour, the owner decided to have the dog shot, as it had by that time fastened with a firm hold on the donkey's nose. A gun was procured and the services of a good shot obtained. But so savage was the fight that it was difficult to shoot one animal without killing the other also. At last aim was taken, and a bullet put into the dog's head, and it dropped to the ground. When the smoke cleared away the dog was dead, but the infuriated donkey had returned to the charge, kicking, biting and tramping on the dead dog. It was with great difficulty the donkey was at last driven off.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

COTTAGE PUDDING.—One cup sugar, three eggs, four spoonfuls milk, one cup flour, two teaspoonfuls baking powder. Bake in a loaf.

CREAM FOR PUDDING.—One egg, one cup sugar, one pint milk, one cup flour; boil until thick; flavor the pudding and cream with lemon.

GERMAN MILK SOUP.—One quart milk, one pint water, one-half teaspoonful sugar, one-half teaspoonful salt, six slices of a 5-cent wheat loaf.

FRIED BRAINS.—Soak in hot water a few minutes, when they can be cleansed readily, then cut into pieces, salt and pepper, dip in beaten eggs, roll in corn meal and fry.

WHIPPED POTATOES.—Whip boiled mealy potatoes light and dry with a fork. Then whip in a little melted butter and milk (or cream) with salt to taste, until you have a creamy compound. Pile irregularly upon a hot dish.

TO PICKLE PEPPERS.—Take green peppers; remove the seeds very carefully so as not to mangle the pods; soak them nine days in salt and water, changing the water every day; keep in a warm place; stuff them with chopped cabbage, seasoned with cloves, cinnamon and mace, then put them in cold spiced vinegar.

BUTTER-SCOTCH CANDY.—One pound of sugar, one-half pint of water. Boil as hard as possible without graining. When done add half a cup of butter, and lemon juice for flavor, if desired. Turn on a buttered dish, or, better, a marble slab, and, when partly cool, cut with a knife into small squares, and when cool a slight tap will break them off.

OAT-MEAL FOR SUPPER.—One quart water, one and one-half cups oat-meal, one-half teaspoonful salt; let boil for one hour over a brisk fire, but do not burn; set back on the stove, and let it cook gently for another hour; serve in soup-plates, with sugar and plenty of fresh milk. I live in the country and have plenty of fresh milk, so my recipe may not be of much value to city folks.

WHEAT CAKES.—Three cups flour, two cups Indian meal, white; dissolve one small cake of compressed yeast in a cup of water, pour into a jar, add flour and meal, mix with lukewarm water to a stiff batter, set in warm place to rise over night; next morning add a table-spoonful sirup, one table-spoonful salt, one teaspoon soda; bake on a hot griddle. I always save a cup of batter to start the next day with, using fresh yeast once a week.

CRANBERRY DUMPLING.—One quart of flour, one teaspoonful of soda and two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar, sifted together; mix into a soft dough with sweet milk; roll the dough out very thin in oblong shapes, and spread over it one quart of cranberries, picked and washed clean; add half a pound of sugar, sprinkled evenly; fold over and over, then tie in a pudding cloth and put into a steamer, where let it cook over a steady fire for one hour, with faith, never looking into the pot. Serve with sweet wine sauce.

Treatment of the Hair.

How to preserve the hair is a subject which seems to interest almost everybody, if we may judge from the frequent inquiries from every direction which come to this office. One wishes to know what will prevent baldness, another how to preserve their hair from turning gray, another how to eradicate dandruff, etc. Now it is a delicate matter to recommend any special treatment, but Prof. Wilson, of England, who is deemed high authority on the hair, condemns washing it, and advises, instead, thorough brushing. This promotes circulation, removes scurf, and is in all respects, he says, better than water.

Cutting the hair does not, as commonly thought, promote its growth. Most of the specifics recommended for baldness, not excepting petroleum, are mere stimulants, and are seldom or never permanently successful. Some of them give rise to congestion of the scalp. When a stimulant is desirable, ammonia is the best. It is safe.

For falling out of the hair, Dr. Wilson prescribes a lotion composed of water of ammonia, almond oil, and chloroform, one part each, diluted with five parts alcohol, or spirits of rosemary, the whole made fragrant with a drachm of oil of lemon. Dab it on the skin, after thorough friction with the hair brush. It may be used sparingly or abundantly, daily or otherwise.

For a cooling lotion, one made of two drachms of borax and glycerine to eight ounces of distilled water is effective, allaying dryness, subduing irritability, and removing dandruff.

Both baldness and grayness depend on the defective powers of the scalp skin and are to be treated alike. What is needed is moderate stimulation, without any irritation. The following is good: Rub into the bare places daily, or even twice a day, a liniment of camphor, ammonia, chloroform and aconite, equal parts each. The friction should be very gentle.—Scientific American.

Vesuvius.

Vesuvius is not as it used to be, and presents a very striking aspect at present. Around the great cone three craters launch steam and incandescent lava, which loses itself between Vesuvius and Mount Somma. At the end of October two small craters opened, blowing off portions of the mountain which obstructed the issue of lava. This is flowing slowly in a northeasterly direction, as is visible to the naked eye from Naples. In spite of the smoke, showers of pumice-stone, scoriæ and red ashes, curious visitors do not hesitate to approach the edge of the crater. The heat is bearable there at a distance of twenty-five to thirty meters.

PROF. PROCTOR alludes to the earth as the mere mustard seed on which we animalculæ live.

THE HOME DOCTOR.

POISONING, AND HOW TO TREAT IT.

The last number of Lippincott's Magazine contains a valuable article, by Dr. Charles W. Dulles, upon this subject, the concluding portion of which we print below. Let every subscriber to our paper cut it out and paste in a conspicuous place, where it can be consulted in cases of emergency. Many a precious life may thereby be preserved:

Let it be remembered that, when there is an alarm of poisoning, some one, at least, must keep cool; then that a physician is to be summoned (sending him word, if possible, what poison had been taken); and that, until his arrival, the course indicated below should be followed. To save time in an emergency, the following table may be consulted, which gives the name of each poison we have already studied, and the proper treatment for it:

Poison.	Treatment.
1. Unknown	Provoke repeated vomiting; Give bland liquids; Stimulate, if necessary.
2. Acids— Sulphuric, Nitric, Muriatic, Oxalic.	Give an alkali; Provoke vomiting; Give bland fluids; Secure rest; Stimulate, if necessary.
3. Alkalies— Hartshorn, Soda, Potash, Lye.	Give an acid (vinegar); Provoke vomiting; Give bland liquids; Secure rest; Stimulate, if necessary.
4. Arsenic— Paris green, School's Green.	Provoke vomiting;* Give dialyzed iron and salt;* Give a dose of castor oil; Secure rest; Stimulate, if necessary.
5. Sugar of lead	Give Epsom salts;* Provoke vomiting;* Give bland liquids; Give dose castor oil.
6. Corrosive Sublimate, Tartar Emetic.	Provoke vomiting;* Give strong tea, without milk;* Give raw eggs and milk; Give dose castor oil; Stimulate, if necessary.
7. Phosphorus	Provoke vomiting; Give five-grain doses of sulphate of copper; Give dose of magnesia, but no oil.
8. Opium— Laudanum, Paregoric, etc., Chloral.	Provoke vomiting, repeatedly; Give strong coffee, without milk; Keep up the breathing.
9. Strychnia	Provoke vomiting, once or twice; Give a purgative; Secure absolute quiet.
10. Aconite	Provoke vomiting; Stimulate well.
11. Lunar Caustic (nitrate of silver	Give strong salt and water;† Provoke vomiting.†
12. Alcohol	Provoke vomiting; Give hartshorn and water.
13. Jamestown Weed, Hemlock, Nightshade (belladonna), Toadstools, Tobacco.	Provoke vomiting; Stimulate well.
14. Decayed Meat and Vegetables	Provoke vomiting; Give a purgative; Give powdered charcoal.

*Repeat several times. †Repeat many times.

To promote vomiting, warm water may be used, with or without ground mustard (a table-spoonful to a pint of water), or ipecac (a teaspoonful of the powder or a table-spoonful or two of the sirup), and thrusting a finger down the throat. It is best to give large quantities (that is, a pint at a time) of warm water whenever vomiting is to be excited.

Bland liquids are milk, raw eggs, some sort of oil, gruel, etc.

Stimulants are tea, coffee, whisky, wine, etc., or hartshorn and water. Of this a teaspoonful in a teacupful of of water will be enough for a dose. In making tea or coffee one must not wait to do it as for the table, but mix hot water and the leaves or grounds, squeeze them well, stir together, and give the whole—leaves, grounds, everything. At the same time some may be made regularly if there are conveniences for it.

Alkaline antidotes are hartshorn and water (a table-spoonful in two teacupfuls of water), soap and water, lime, whiting, soda, chalk, tooth-powder, plaster, magnesia, white-wash, and even wood ashes.

Acid antidotes are vinegar and lemon juice.

In giving an antidote never wait for it to dissolve. Just stir it up in any fluid at hand except oil, and have it swallowed immediately.

Kossuth.

Some new light may be expected to be thrown upon contemporary history by the work on which Kossuth has been for some time past engaged. Despite his advanced age, Kossuth daily devotes ten hours out of every twenty-four to the work of composition, compilation, and arrangement, for the book he is about to give to the world will consist not only of his personal memoirs, but of his political writings and speeches, whose name is legion. The first volume is announced for publication before the end of the present year. It will be perused nowhere with more lively interest than within the family circle of the Emperor-King, in the first year of whose reign the great Magyar patriot was condemned to death as a rebel and compelled to quit the country, a proscribed and penniless exile. The Crown Prince Rudolph is as enthusiastic an admirer of the Hungarian language and literature as are his august parents, and Kossuth's orations in that tongue, unrivaled for elegance of style, are favorite reading with the future Hungarian King. A pleasant story is told how, some short time ago, he learned, by mere accident, that one of the speeches in question had been kept back from him by his tutor, on the ground that it advocated the dethronement and expulsion of the Hapsburg dynasty. His Imperial Highness asked for the speech, but could not obtain it from his attendants, whereupon he appealed to the Emperor, and Francis Joseph at once gave orders that it should be procured for his son, whose desire to read it met with his entire approval.

Whisky and Charity.

Two notices, framed, glazed and suspended upon the walls of a dramshop on the New canal, at St. Petersburg, close to Mme. Sassetzki's "Refuge for the Homeless," are reckoned among the curiosities of the Russian capital. They run as follows: "I exhort the gentlemen who honor my establishment with their patronage to forego robbery and theft while within its precincts, not to thrash one another, and, on the whole, not to make unpleasant noises. Those who act in contravention to this warning will receive punishment in my dramshop of a sort they will experience no difficulty in feeling." The second notice affords a quaint contrast to the first: "As soon as the cold and rainy weather shall set in, five copecks will be here advanced to each needy and weary man, that he may pay for a bed whereon to rest his body." The author of these notices faithfully adheres to the text of both. If his customers misconduct themselves he lays into them with a cudgel; but any poor wretch presenting himself after 8 in the evening for assistance receives the five copecks after he has exhibited his legitimation papers and listened to a short exhortation, read aloud to him from a religious book.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

ORCHARDS in Great Britain now occupy 175,000 acres, against 165,000 in 1878.

WITHIN the past five years the acreage of cereals in the United States has increased from 74,000,000 to 95,000,000.

HORSE breeding is increasing in England, and imports into that country declined from 30,000 in 1877, and 26,000 in 1878, to less than 18,000 in 1879.

THE minimum height of English infantry recruits has been raised from 5 feet 5 inches to 5 feet 6 inches—which means that the supply is now in excess of the demand.

OF the white people who took the yellow fever during the late epidemic in Memphis 44.4 per cent. are said to have died. There were altogether 1,537 cases of fever and 487 deaths, a total death percentage of 31.6.

FAIRMOUNT PARK, Philadelphia, contains 2,791 acres and cost $6,740,554 for purchase of lands, and $1,000,000 for improvements, making the total expenditure $7,740,554. The average annual cost for maintenance during the last ten years was $181,114.

THE annual Yale catalogue gives the number of students at 1,003—theology, 88; medicine, 32; law, 74; post graduates, 39; scientifics, 175; academical Seniors, 123; Juniors, 139; Sophomores, 135; Freshmen, 184; fine-art school, 39. There are 100 professors, instructors and lecturers.

AT the close of the seventh century pure imported wine was the ordinary drink of all but the humblest class in England and many parts of Scotland. Between 1740 and 1750 champagne, even with a heavy duty, was consigned to English firms at 56 cents a bottle, equal to about $1.50 to $2 at present values.

A CURIOUS calculation has been made by a continental statistician as to the amount drawn by various sovereigns from the civil list. According to this it appears that the Czar has 125,000f. per day; the Sultan, 90,000f.; the Emperor of Germany, 41,000f.; the King of Italy, 32,000f., and the King of the Belgians, 8,215f.

THE corn crop of the West for 1879 is almost fabulous. The acreage for Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Illinois and Wisconsin is estimated at 23,000,000, which, based on the yield of 40 bushels per acre, will give 920,000,000 bushels, making an increase for this year over last of some 200,000,000 bushels for the States mentioned.

THE system of telegraphs in Europe comprised, at the end of 1877, 268,809 miles of lines, and 769,768 miles of of wires. There were 19,627 Government telegraph stations, and 12,708 railway and special stations. The number of employes amounted to 61,984, and the number of instruments to 41,708. The number of paid messages was, in round numbers, 86,000,000, of which 20,000,000 were international dispatches. The number of other telegrams forwarded amounted to about 7,000,000. M. Newman Spallart gives the following statistics for the other parts of the world. In America (1875 to 1877), 114,157 miles of wires; 8,756 stations; 23,000,000 telegrams. In Asia (1875 to 1876), 24,521 miles of wires; 489 stations; 2,300,000 telegrams. Australia (1875), 23,582 miles of wires; 689 stations; 2,500,000 telegrams. Africa (1874 to 1876), 8,148 miles of wires; 196 stations; 1,200,000 telegrams.

Dramatic Scene at a Murder Trial.

There was an exciting scene in the Hayden murder trial at New Haven, Ct. During the cross-examination of Mrs Hayden, the Prosecuting Attorney asked the following question:

"Now, madame, you needn't answer this question until you are told by the court; Mr. Hayden, you say, is your husband, the father of your three children, and he has been a devoted husband to a loving wife, for between eight and nine years. You have constantly maintained pleasant relations, and there has been, and is now, the utmost confidence existing between you. You are convinced of his innocence, and know that if he is found guilty he must suffer an ignominous punishment. Under these circumstances would you not, under oath, as you are, make a misstatement in order to save him from punishment?"

There was no answer. The witness burst into tears, as did nearly every woman in court, and tears glistened in the eyes of members of the sterner sex. A silence as of death pervaded the room, and the counsel for the defense hissed out, "It is an insult to the witness."

The Prosecuting Attorney defended his action, but the court ruled the question an improper one.

A Sudden Awakening.

An Oil Citizen of an enthusiastic nature became convinced of the error of his ways and determined to reform. He joined the church, but found it extremely difficult to give up all his bad habits. Among other things he had been an inveterate swearer, and his tongue would persist in slipping quite frequently. One Sunday he went to church, and, being sleepy, began nodding. Finally, he got his cane in front of him, and, resting his head on the handle, went to the land of Nod. He was sleeping sweetly and serenely, when some sinful cuss kicked the cane out and the newly-converted Christian's head came down on the back of the seat in front of him like a pile-driver, causing him to ejaculate with unnecessary emphasis: "Great God!"

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, DEC. 25, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY
EDITORS.

FOR PRESIDENT,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS.

Subject to the decision of the democratic national convention.

"NO SOLID SOUTH, NO SOLID NORTH, BUT A SOLID UNION."

Dan. Rice, the great showman, has been converted by Moody and Sankey, and will enter the temperance field as a lecturer.

The republican national convention will meet in Chicago on the 3d of June next, to ratify the nomination of Grant for a third term.

The name of Thomas A. Hendricks appears at the head of the editorial columns of the Indianapolis Sentinel, for president. Better late than never.

Wm. McKee, senior partner in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat newspaper establishment, died at his home in St. Louis, last Saturday morning, of heart disease.

Down in Johnson county the republicans are locating the exodus negroes in townships having republican trustees, in order that they may be supported by township funds.

Of all the great men of the great city of Fort Wayne, not one is an applicant for census supervisor, at least we have not heard of one. Is it because there is not much pay in it?

The democratic state central committee will meet at Indianapolis Thursday, January 8. We suggest that the central committee of this county meet Saturday, January 17, 1880.

Grant is to be nominated for a third term, that is fixed. Don Cameron had only to say that he was for Grant, in order to be made chairman of the republican national committee.

The ragged, cold and hungry negroes arriving in this state from North Carolina are being left without protection by the republican leaders who induced them to come for the purpose of making the state republican.

Cincinnati is making great preparation for the reception of the southern delegation to arrive in that city over the Cincinnati Southern railroad, some time during January. The merchants propose to spend $25,000 in entertaining the visitors.

Mr. R. M. Lockhart, of Waterloo, is an applicant for the appointment of census supervisor for this district. As the person appointed will undoubtedly be a republican, we can think of no fitter man for the position than Mr. Lockhart. He is a man of sound judgement and great energy, and will not be influenced or made the tool of any party. He would make an efficient officer and we hope he will get the position.

"Recognizing the Republican as a rival," no one furnished it with a slip containing the commissioners' proceedings last week.—Waterloo Press.

Not quite so fast, Bro. Baxter; if you will examine the Republican of last week you will find the commissioners' proceedings, copied from the COURIER of the week before, without credit. That is a very common occurrence however, and we have become somewhat accustomed to it. The Republican of week before last contained a table showing the distribution of funds to townships and towns, which table was taken from the COURIER of the week before, also without credit. And while on this subject we desire to remind Bro. Powell of the Garrett Herald, that he too occasionally neglects common courtesy, in not giving proper credit to the COURIER news items; in stance, November marriage licenses. We do not wish to be understood as having any objection to the reproduction of the matter prepared and published by us in advance of our county cotemporaries, but we insist on the proper credit.

The Fort Wayne Sentinel and the New Albany Ledger Standard, are two democratic papers in Indiana, that happen to use the same quill—a quill plucked from Tilden's goose. The Sentinel in giving a list of influential papers (11 in the whole United States) that favor Tilden's nomination, includes in that list the New York Sun and Cincinnati Enquirer, neither of which are committed in favor of any candidate. The Ledger Standard asserts that nine-tenths of the democracy favor Tilden's nomination, a claim that could only be imagined after successive dreams of the "barrel." A democratic paper, published in the state of Indiana, that will go out of its way to misrepresent public sentiment for the purpose of discharging an obligation to Sam. Tilden, is unworthy of the respect and confidence of Indiana democracy. It is evident that "the telling influence" is being brought to bear in the midst of the friends of Mr. Hendricks, and the sooner it is understood that the delegation from this state cannot be secured for Tilden the better. It is time for every democratic newspaper in Indiana, favorable to Mr. Hendricks, to speak out against the sale of the state democracy for a money consideration.

Representative Colerick has introduced the following bill in congress for the protection of innocent purchasers of patented articles from actions for damages:

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That no action shall be instituted in any court against any person for damages for an infringment of a patented article where the purchaser thereof purchased the same for his own use without knowledge of the fact that said article was an infringment of any patent; and if such action is instituted against any such person, the fact that he purchased the same innocently as aforesaid, shall, if established, be a complete defense to said action.

Sec. 2. All acts, and parts of acts, in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

The attempt to re-open the currency question and thus occupy the time of congress, we regard as a very unwise move. A prosperous era is just dawning upon this country, and any unfinished legislation tending to weaken the confidence of capitalists will retard improvement and business enterprise of every nature. The country is not ready to act upon a final disposition of the currency question, and until the people have made up their minds and settled upon something practical, this continual tinkering will amount to nothing. We believe that when the proper time comes, the people will demand that gold and silver coin shall be recognized as the constitutional currency of this country; that they will demand a paper currency for the purposes of trade, in the shape of treasury notes redeemable in coin at any government depository; that the notes shall not be a legal tender, but be receivable for all dues due the United States; that national bank notes shall be retired as fast as the bank charters expire; that the government shall keep a coin reserve of at least 33⅓ per cent. of the treasury notes in circulation, for redemption purposes; that the coinage of gold and silver shall not be limited, and that a tax be levied upon state and private banks of issue sufficient to prevent the organization and existence of such banks, thereby allowing the government to furnish the only paper currency used in the trade.

Considerable is being said by newspapers of all political parties, concerning the action of Gov. Garcelon and council in the state of Maine, in rejecting certain election returns whereby an apparent republican majority in the state legislature was changed, leaving the republicans in the minority. Gov. Garcelon has made a statement in defense of the action of himself and council, from which we make the following extract:

"In the inspection of returns and tabulation of the same, which has just been completed by myself and council, it has been our purpose to apply to every return the same rule, to-wit: compliance with the requirements of the constitution and the law, without fear or favor; and if the result as to the political complexion of the legislature is different from what was claimed by politicians interested in influencing the elections in other states, it is owing in part to the fact that the claim is unfounded, and in part to the carelessness of municipal officers in making their returns. The truth is, the popular vote was against the republican party, and in the representative and senatorial districts the vote was extremely close. In addition to the fact that several persons failed to receive their certificates in consequence of "fatal defects" in the returns from their towns or cities, there are others who would have been presumably elected but for the carelessness of the voters themselves or the ignorance of the candidates or those who provided ballots at the elections. The judges of our supreme court have decided that ballots cast for William H. Smith and W. H. Smith are ballots to be counted separately. Several changes have resulted from this condition of affairs. In one county persons with as many as four different combinations in initials received the republican vote and two the democratic. That county was entitled to only one senator, and there was no alternative but to give the certificate to the person having the highest number of votes. In the Danforth district, already notorious, the name of the republican candidate was Charles A Rolfe. The town of Danforth voted for Charles Rolfe. The result was that his competitor received the certificate, and from like causes other changes have occurred.

The great hue and cry about "conspiracy," "fraud," etc., arises from the fact that we have taken the constitution for our guide, fortified by the opinions of the supreme court of the state and the advice of several of the foremost legal gentlemen of the forum, and have not permitted substitution, alteration or unauthorized amendments of the returns transmitted to us for examination and by us to be transmitted to the legislature for their final action. In other words, we have not resolved ourselves into a returning board to investigate fraud, bribery, illegal proceedings at the polls, and the thousand and one charges of corruption that are afloat, but have left this whole matter to the action of the legislature, where it properly belongs. The governor and council have recognized the fact that the people of Maine have adopted a constitution and declared it to be the supreme law of the state. They have followed its requirements with fidelity and impartiality, and when an intelligent public have brushed away the mists and false colorings which enraged and discomfited politicians have thrown around our action, and the vituperation and slander that has been heaped upon us has given place to reason and fair investigation, any condemnation of our course, either by the democracy of the nation or any fair-minded and honorable politicians of any party, will be acknowledged with due submission."

Bill Nelson of the Fort Wayne Sentinel recently visited New York. The Sentinel is a Tilden organ now. Straws, wind, etc.

EDUCATIONAL COLUMN.

By Prof. W. H. MacIntosh.

SCHOOL VISITATIONS.

Section 39 of the school laws of Indiana declares that the county superintendent "shall visit each school of the county at least once each year, for the purpose of increasing their usefulness, and elevate as far as practicable the poorer schools to the standard of the best." In connection with these visits there is given authority to direct the general management of schools, and the superintendent enters each school-room to observe the tone and spirit there pervading, the conduct and application of pupils, the methods and management of the teacher, and the fitness and condition of the premises. He commends what is excellent, suggests improvements, gently indicates faults, and briefly addressing the school encourages exertion, good morals and manners. Teachers are specially interested, and the half day passing all too soon, are anxious for a second visit to prove progress.

The superintendent learns that there is a wide difference between the book knowledge which enables an applicant to answer a certain per cent. of questions, and the essentials to the make-up of a qualified instructor.

Answer to questions do not indicate enthusiasm, love of children, personal presence and wordless control, and actual inspection is the only certain test of ability.

The superintendent is the best friend of the worthy teacher, and whatever he finds deserving of praise will receive it. Country schools should be made as efficient as possible, and the farmer boys and girls should be encouraged to make the most of the time passed in the study of the common branches. Their attention should be called to the use to be made of their learning, the cost incurred by parents, and the life-long benefits realized by the learned. Such are thoughts which sway the county superintendent as he enters upon his work, and the attention of the public is called to the following and subsequent accounts of visits made to the schools of each township. Where trustees cannot accompany the inspector, report is made to them at township teachers' meetings.

BUTLER TOWNSHIP.

In this township there are six schoolhouses, placed upon school sites, generally of one acre each. Three of these are enclosed with board fences, and No. 1 has a plank walk from the schoolhouse door to the road-side. There are forest trees for shade to a number of the buildings, and on the site of No. 6 there is a well. Three of the outhouses are in a bad condition, and the others are but medium. The practice of building these double is very objectionable. They should be removed from each other as far as practicable. Buildings are new, mostly of brick, and are all in excellent condition and well seated. The seats and desks furnished by rival houses are all of good quality. Rooms are well lighted, and in two cases effort has been made to secure a constant supply of wholesome air. In two schools, discipline is good, in two it is medium, and in two it is poor. All have regular programmes; classes number in each school from sixteen to nineteen. In three the register is well kept. There is a dictionary in each school. Some of these are well worn, and need to be replaced by new ones. There are excellent blackboards, chairs and desks. The school showing the highest enrollment is No. 2, which has 42; the lowest is No. 5, with 19. The enrollments in the schools is 181. Of these, 130 study aritmetic, 74 geography, 52 grammar, 15 physiology and 10 United States history. In two schools the books are uniform, and are those prescribed by the board of education.

No. 1. As people have general resemblances yet individual distinctive differences, so schools have an identity of their own. Houses, furniture, children and teachers are unlike in the same township.

At No. 1 you enter a large, well-lighted room. Near the door stands a good stove, the pipe runs high, is well secured and extends to the rear of the apartment where it enters a flue in the wall.

Upon a fine blackboard is placed the programme of daily exercises. The furniture, of modern make, exhibits marks of hard usage. A hand bell not used to call classes, stands upon the desk. As an experienced school-teacher, Robert McDougall has long been known, and exhibits in the school-room many desirable traits. Seated in his armchair before classes, he gives to them almost exclusive attention and receives from them the same. His tone is subdued and kind; his manner is composed and engaged. Writing is given a half hour's time. Copies are written by teacher in books made from foolscap paper. The capital D being the lesson, was resolved into principles upon the board below the chart. Large pupils set worthy examples in behavior and diligence.

No. 2. In the frame schoolhouse at Butler Center, before the hour for "taking-up," we find F. M. Merica, a young, faithful and energetic teacher, glad to learn and apt in application. The room was swept clean, and the apartment was warmed to a healthful temperature. Each pupil entering took his seat at once as school was called. The morals of the school is excellent,—honorable alike to pupils, teacher and parents. Upon the board there was an honor roll for spelling, containing names of sixteen pupils. Several pupils in fifth reader show qualities whose cultivation will make of them good readers. One of a class in physiology gave a recitation which would be creditable to any school. There are no obsolete text books in use. A class of large pupils placed examples upon the board while one of smaller size recited from slates. These spoke with clearness, celerity and spirit. The eagerness of a class of beginners in reading, urging on a slow pupil, illustrates the potent influence of numbers. A large class while spelling words of three syllables, pronounced only each syllable without repeating, and the plan is worth a trial by all.

No. 3. Trustee Broughton and myself walked from No. 2 to No. 3, and found a new building recently completed. A quantity of old fire wood lies scattered upon a part of the schoolground. The want of wood-houses is seen in the wastage of fuel enough to have built them. Lessons in mental arithmetic showed analytical drill. A class of four in physiology gave a well-nigh perfect topical recitations. The school is retarded by the want of uniform text books. The final impression is favorable, and the young teacher, John Beard, will find pleasure in carefully adjusting his powers to render his instruction and supervision efficient.

No. 4. A ride upon the morning Eel River train to Cedar Creek station and a lengthy walk southward brings us to the Holbrook schoolhouse. Without and within, all is neat and well arranged. C. W. Smith, of La Otto, has but fairly got started. Behavior is good, order is irreproachable. The teacher wishes rules for reading memorized and then made applicable. There is a medley of school books. Among them is Ray's higher arithmetic and the eclectic geography—the latter books being new, their introduction is questionable. Seeing the teacher take books from pupils, requiring them to "look over" with another, suggests that trustees supply teachers with a set of books, such as they are required to use, to be returned at the close of the term. Many teachers give preponderance of time and energy to the recitation, and forget that its chief aim is to excite and direct study. It is a power with the experienced, but an awkward, perplexing duty to the novice. The scheme of recitation is earnestly commended to the careful study and patient practice of the teacher.

—No. 5. There is a neat, new and nicely-furnished house. In numbers the school is small. The behavior and diligence of a half dozen larger pupils equals that of the best found in town schools. M. J. Weller is no sluggard at work. His scholars, consulting their own interests, are industrious, and he is free to give exclusive time to make class-instruction profitable. If the order is independent of him, he is indeed fortunate in having so pleasant a school. If it is due to his influence, it is very creditable to him. Considerable time is given to each class, yet he does not get behind on his programme. A class in grammar parses quite well and shows a knowledge of the subject.

No. 6. Here is another new house; the windows are provided with muslin curtains. There is an excellent stove, and the teacher's desk is one of the best yet seen. The location is solitary, and surrounded on three sides by forest trees. The school is being taught by Charles Dugan, of Auburn, whose fine scholarship has now for the first time been brought into requisition for the benefit of others. He finds need of constant vigilance, frequent reminders, cordial aid and hearty encouragement. Primary teaching requires an aptitude and training to secure success. There is a belief in the educational paradox, that small children learning first-principles need only medium teachers. This is not shared by the people of No. 6 who, in choosing Mr. Dugan, secured a teacher whose instruction is simple and natural. Slates are brought into frequent and general use; the children are teachable, and there is promise of the performance of valuable work. Taken as a unit, the schools of Butler are teaching moral worth and intellectual power. Education is expensive, we are told. All good things are expensive; but if every expenditure of public money can be as fully and clearly justified as that for the education of our children, our officers will never be censured by the people they represent.

Spencerville.

—Dick paid his bet on the wedding.

—Mr. Schappach is suffering with rheumatism.

—Willie Batts, of Green Springs, Ohio, is visiting friends in town.

—The holiday trade has been immense during the last few days.

—Upon complaint of Sam. Warner, two of our "lemon squeezers" waltzed over to 'Squire Fales' and donated two dollars and costs.

—The teachers institute held on Friday and Saturday last, was largely attended, and was one of the most interesting institutes ever held in this place. We presume a full report will be furnished the press by the secretary.

—The Lutheran congregation will have a Christmas table, and the Methodist will have an arch, each congregation having concert exercises in connection with table and arch.

—Hereafter all monthly reports of schools, and other matter of interest to the locality from which it comes only, must be handed in not later than Friday in order to have it appear in the issue of the next week.

—The trial of George Hazzard now in progress at Indianapolis, is bringing to the surface some very crooked transactions on the part of the defendant. The indications are that George will have an opportunity to learn a trade.

—The ladies society of the Presbyterian church will be entertained at the residence of Mr. A. J. Ralston, on next Wednesday afternoon and evening. An invitation is extended to all.

Mrs. J. E. Rose, Sec'y.

—The News of yesterday says: "All the masqueres are going to Gordon's." We shouldn't think Mr. Gordon would want any such things around his establishment. "Masqueres" is a real good word, but what in creation does it mean? Consult your "booktionery," boys.

Died:—At her residence, 5 miles east of Auburn, Saturday, Dec. 20, 1879, Mary Ann McGown, aged 66 years, 7 months and 3 days. The deceased was born in Wayne township, Steuben county, New York. She was buried in the Auburn cemetery last Sunday, Rev. Meese officiating.

—Married:—At the residence of Mr. A. Lewis, in Auburn, on Tuesday, Dec. 23rd, by Rev. H. Johnson, Judge Chas. W. Kaley, of Red Cloud, Nebraska, and Miss Cyrelia A. Widney of this place. The best wishes of the citizens of this community go with Mrs. Kaley to her new home.

—The Indiana State Teachers' Association, will convene at Indianapolis next Monday, for a three day's session. Hon. T. A. Hendricks will deliver the address of welcome. Prof. M. Seiler, formerly of this place, will discuss "Science in Elementary Schools." Reduced fare on all railroads.

Wanted.

300,000 oak hub-blocks at 6 cents each. 200,000 oak spokes at $13 per M. 100,000 feet hickory plank at $15 per M. The oak spokes must be 28 inches long, and 2x3 inches thick. Hickory plank must be eight feet in length, 1¼ and 1½ inches thick. Hub-blocks must be 13 inches long and 9 inches in diameter. All to be delivered at the factory in Auburn. I have made arrangements for special frieght rates on railroads, for those who desire to deliver by rail.

"Republican Boom."

An article in the DeKalb County Republican of last week, under the above flaming headline, starts out as follows:

"The following are the names and and address of new subscribers to the Republican, received within the last ten days. Now, we want our readers to know what is thought of the Republican, and to convince them of the popularity of their favorite paper. Such a list speaks volumes for the intelligence and enterprise of our farmers and others, to whom we return our warmest thanks."

Then follows a list of names of subscribers in Spencerville and vicinity. The article started out first-rate, but our friends of the Republican failed to give the full particulars—failed to explain how the "boom" came about, and for the information of the republicans of DeKalb county (a majority of whom read the Courier) we undertake to explain how "their favorite paper" secured so many subscribers "within the last ten days." It is said that one P. Bishop, a drygoods merchant and newspaper broker, doing business in the town of Spencerville, concluded that it would pay to advertise extensively during the coming year, (a wise conclusion) and not feeling disposed to invest his capital in a printing office, conceived the idea of affecting an arrangement with the Republican, whereby he could induce the people of Concord township to advertise the goods which they were expected to purchase. Having had a mathematical education, Mr. Bishop was enabled to out-figure the manager of the Republican, and succeeded in closing a contract for one hundred papers, or, one hundred subscriptions for one year, a double half-column advertisement for one year, and a three column advertisement for one week, all for the small sum of $120. By this arrangement, Mr. Bishop is enabled to furnish the Republican to 100 subscribers at the rate of 28 cents each, but he doesn't do it, he charges them $1 each, which will make good $100 of the $120 which he is to pay, so that he will receive $92 worth of advertising, estimated at regular rates, (which are: 3 columns, 1 week @ $4.00 ea $12.00; double half-column, 1 year, $80.00) for the sum of $20.00. The three column advertisement appeared last week, the double-half column will appear again this week. The subscribers names are being forwarded as fast as taken, and the list of last week was part of the 100.

It will doubtless be in order for regular subscribers in other parts of the county, to inquire why they are charged $1.50 and $2.00 for the Republican, while it is being furnished to the people of Concord township for $1.00, and ought to be furnished by Mr. Bishop for 28 cents, for he will get full value in advertising, except $28.00. If the manager of the Republican estimated the 100 subscribers at $1.00 each, then he is only getting $20 for $92 worth of advertising, and if he can afford to give Mr. Bishop a discount of nearly 80 per cent., other advertisers have a right to ask the same.

AFTERNOON.

Geography, W. Vanzile. Geography of Indiana, G. Flint. Oral arithmetic, Mary Young. Use of globe, S. High.

During the entire institute the best of order was maintained, and the discussions, although animated and heartily engaged in by all, showed due defference for the opponents' opinions, and good will was the distinguishing characteristic of the meeting.

There was a total absence of all formality, and superintendent, trustees and teachers met as equals, and not as ruler and subject, nor as employer and employe.

The lessons were instructive, and commanded the attention of all present. Every teacher called upon filled his place promptly and pleasantly.

May it be the lot of the superintendent to meet all as ready to do the work assigned as were the teachers at Spencerville.

Committee on resolutions reported the following, which were adopted by the institute.

Resolved, That we tender our sincere thanks to the citizens of Spencerville for their hospitality to us.

Resolved, That we tender our thanks to the singers and band of Spencerville for their excellent music.

Resolved, That we, as teachers, have received great benefit from this institute.

Resolved, That teachers be remunerated for attendance at institutes.

Resolved, That teachers should educate themselves in the use of apparatus.

Resolved, That trustees should provide a janitor in each district.

Resolved, That we deplore the inability of the primary teacher, Miss Ella Emanuel, to be in attendance.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this institute be published in the county papers. Frank Sholes, Sec.

Newville.

—No new cases of Scarlet fever in town.

—There is trouble in the school at Orangeville. For particulars inquire of the young ladies.

—The evenings are long and now is the time to subscribe for the Courier. It will do you no harm.

—Rhodes & Son are about trading their stock of goods to Richard Haskins of Edgerton, Ohio, for the farm over the river, known as the Aikens farm.

—The higher department of the Newville school is prospering finely. The lower department has been suspended for two weeks, owing to scarlet fever in the family of the teacher.

Also, $1 for one dog, $2 for each female dog, and $2 for each additional dog, for the collection of which I may be found at the county treasurer's office, in the town of Auburn, on and after December 15th, 1879.

Taxes may be paid in full or in two installments. The first installment including all road taxes, can be paid on or before the third Monday in April, 1880; the second installment on or before the first Monday in November, 1880. If the first installment is not paid when due, both installments become delinquent, ten per cent. will be added, and I shall at once proceed, as the law requires, to collect the same, together with the costs that may accrue, by distress and sale of personal property.

Road receipts will not be received after the third Monday in April, only on delinquent taxes. No road receipts will be received on the November installment.

Examine your receipts before leaving the office, and see that all your property is included.

No county order will be paid to any person owing delinquent taxes.

The annual sale of lands and lots for delinquent taxes will occur on the second Monday in February, 1880.

Come early and avoid the rush of the last few days,

The books will positively be closed on the evening of the third Monday in April, and no one will be allowed to pay after that date without penalty.

Parties sending by others, or by letter, to pay tax, should not fail to send description of their lands and lots.

No receipt will be made out hereafter, for any party, until they are ready to pay for the same.

Auburn, Ind., Dec. 15, 1879. DANIEL GONSER, Treasurer of DeKalb County.

49-4t. PATTERSON & SMITH, Waterloo, Ind.

ST. NICHOLAS.

BY EDWARD C. HANCOCK.

"Ho! there at the wicket, who pounds at the door!
Such a din in Olympus was ne'er heard before—
I would sleep—get ye gone—I'm ailing, I'm sick.
What the deuce—there again—who's calling Saint Nick?"

"Arouse ye! arouse ye! It's dawning again—
The star that once beamed over Bethlehem's plain—
The star of the Magi that shone on the morn
When earth's blessed Savior, the Christ-child, was born!"

"Ho! Ho! Is it so! Then I'll up and away
As soon as the goblins can harness my sleigh."

Then he roared such a laugh as he sprung out of bed,
It started the stars in the sky overhead,
And they winked at each other as much as to say,
"There is something gone wrong and Old Nick is to pay."

It took but a moment to jump in his boots,
To wrap himself up in the best of fur suits,
To run to the closet and drag out his pack,
Which he swung with a chuckle across his broad back;
Then off to the stable he dashed through the snow,
Where the reindeer were prancing, all ready to go,
He was up in a jiffy, and cracking his whip,
With a "Hi, there, my hearties!" he let the reins slip.

Straight down through the welkin they sped like the light,
Without pause or turn to the left or the right;
The clouds dragged their skirts to get off of the track,
The winds shrank alarmed—all quite taken aback;
E'en the moon drew in haste a veil over her face
So quick cracked the whip and so fast was the pace;
And he pealed out a laugh so jocund and gay
That Aurora woke up long before it was day;
Oh, never such sleigh-ride was ridden before
As that of St. Nick with his rich Christmas store!

Far down in the distance earth rolled fast asleep,
Dark night having wrapped it in silence so deep
That the children, tucked close in their snug little beds,
Whence nothing peeped out save their cherubim heads,
Were dreaming of fairies, of frolic and fun,
And other stern facts of a life just begun.

It was 3 by the clock, when out on the roof
The tinkle of sleigh bells and taps of a hoof
Made their little hearts bound and flashed round the earth
A smile such as welcomed the Lamb at its birth;
But they woke not. Oh, no! Old Nick is so sly,
He fastens a padlock on each prying eye.

With a "Whoa, there, my pretties," he stops with a jerk,
Lights his pipe, swings his pack, and away to his work,
Over steeples and housetops, in windows, down flues,
So fleet you would think he had wings on his shoes.
In pantries he peeps and through bedrooms he whirls,
Now kissing the babies, now pinching the girls,
Filling up all their stockings with goodies and toys,
Nor forgetting the switch always left for bad boys;
Then on through the play-room to plant those great trees
Which grow dollies and drums with such exquisite ease.

What a jolly fat fellow! so little and spry,
With round, dimpled cheeks and a fun-flashing eye,
Hair jeweled with hailstones, and such a round nose,
It lights up the pathway wherever he goes!
Then his rich, merry laugh—ah! never, I fear,
Will music so sweet again gladden the year!

But time flies apace. Even now a faint ray
Struggles up through the east as the herald of day;
The winds wake in protest and scatter the snow;
Now, listen! the signal! I hear the cock crow.

"Ho, ho," cried Old Nick, with his cheeriest warning,
"Merry Christmas to all, and to all a good morning!"

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

The Widow Winterpippin's Wonderful Dream.

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

This is just how affairs stood in the house in which we lived—brother Nathaniel and I—it was a tenement house, not what they call a "first-class" one, but a very nice one—on the Christmas eve before that Christmas night.

In the basement the three little children of Mrs. Rose, the janitor's wife, were quietly playing with their dolls for the first time in several weeks, having been sick nigh unto death, and their poor, tired mother was hovering about them, her thin, pale face lighted up with thankfulness and joy, albeit a cloud did flit across it now and then, as she thought of the debts contracted during their sickness—debts which at the present time—Mr. Rose having been out of work for three long months—she had but the faintest hope of ever being able to pay.

On the first floor Mrs. McChilly—old, obstinate and—well, to speak plainly—stingy Mrs. McChilly—spectacles on nose and head held close to the lamp, was looking over for the fiftieth time the bonds, willed her by her brother, who had recently died in San Francisco, and received by her a few days before, making her—already in comfortable, very comfortable circumstances—what in our sphere of life would be considered rich. Her girlish-looking granddaughter, by marriage, was darning the old lady's stockings, and thinking of the dear, young brother-in-law, banished from his home a year ago—a home which had never been so sunshiny since—because he had dared to fall in love without his grandmother's consent, and the boyish-looking husband of the granddaughter, by marriage, was writing a cheerful affectionate, letter to the banished one, under cover of the daily account-book.

On the second floor pretty, grey-eyed, brown-haired Mrs. Summer was hushing the baby to sleep, and dropping tears on its little golden head whenever, which was very often, she glanced at her husband who lay snoring on the lounge, having left a convivial party late that afternoon to stagger home, as he had done many times during the last unhappy year, with aching head and empty pockets.

On the third floor jolly, plump, black-eyed, rosy-cheeked, generous (out of her income of a thousand a year she gave away at least one-eighth) Widow Winterpippin was calmly sleeping in her bed, thoroughly tired out by a hard day's work, and Nannie, her little maid, with the cat in her lap, was dozing in a spasmodic manner in a rocking-chair by the kitchen fire.

And on the fourth floor brother Nathaniel and I were taking a late supper because I had been obliged to remain longer than usual at the store where I was clerk, it being the custom of our employer to exact extra service all holiday week (without, however, thinking it necessary to requite such service with extra pay), and dear Nat—than whom there never could be a kinder brother—would not, though he might be ever so hungry, eat supper until I was there to make and pour out the tea. "It tastes so much better from your hand, Sis," he used to say.

Nathaniel was a printer, and had been a fine, stalwart, singing, whistling fellow until that dreadful day in September when he met with the terrible accident which resulted in the loss of his right arm.

Since then he had been on the invalid list, and sang and whistled and joked no more. We had, fortunately, some money saved when this misfortune came upon us, but it was now almost exhausted. And Nat began to worry about that, among other things; but I never lost heart. Why should I? I had youth, health and strength and $12 a week. And we could manage not to starve or freeze on $12 a week, and Nat's overcoat and my cloak could both be turned, and—somebody was coming home soon.

Widow Winterpippin—God bless her—proved an angel of goodness during our trouble, coming to sit with Nat herself when his arm was at the worst; I had to go to the store after the first few days, or the salary would have ceased, though they did, for a wonder, give me an extra half-hour at noon when I went home to lunch—sending Nannie to wait on him when he was getting better, and making all sorts of nice dishes to tempt his appetite, and lending him all the nicest books and keeping the room bright with beautiful flowers. But it wasn't this kindness that made Nat fall in love with her. Oh, no! for he had fallen in love with her long before, and was on the point of telling her so when that cruel machinery grasped his arm.

"But I must give her up now, Susie," he said to me—we had no secrets from each other—"though I love her more than ever. 'Twould have been no match, in a worldly sense, for her, before—a printer with only what he earned from week to week, and a pretty young widow, owning houses and lands sufficient to give her an income of a thousand a year. But now it is simply impossible. Disabled for life, I must make up my mind to be a burden on you, and see her marry—"

"You'll do no such thing, Nathaniel," cried I. "What has come over you? It seems to me that the people who are the jolliest when they are jolly are the bluest when they are blue. One would think you'd lost both arms and legs to hear you talk. Do you forget your favorite motto, 'Nil desperandum,' to say nothing of 'Up, guards, and at 'em'?"

But Nat continued very low in his spirits, all I could do or say. And this is how affairs stood in our house the Christmas eve before that Christmas day.

The kettle had just begun to boil next morning, and I had just called out "Merry Christmas" to Nat, hearing him stir in his own room, when Widow Winterpippin's blue-eyed little maid knocked at the door, with a "Merry Christmas," a giggle, and a note from her mistress. The note read:

"Winifred Winterpippin sends her love to Susie and Nathaniel Bracket, and begs that they will, as a great favor, give her their company in her rooms this evening at 7 o'clock.

"And I've got a note for everybody in the house, and there's to be a supper, miss. So don't cook no dinner, miss," said the little maid, laughing outright. (This little maid was almost always laughing, in which respect she much resembled her black-eyed mistress.) "Say we'll come with pleasure, Nannie," said I. "Yes, miss," and away she flew.

And, at 7 precisely, the invited guests were assembled in the widow's pretty parlor. Dear me! How pretty it was. Christmas greens were festooned all around the walls, and anchors, and wreaths, and hearts, and crosses were hung wherever they could be hung, and above the mantel, "Merry Christmas," in large dark-green letters, brightened by crimson berries, greeted us as we entered the door. And there were stands filled with lovely geraniums and begonias, and lilies in each window, and a splendid fire in the grate; and, most charming of all, there was the widow herself in a pearl-gray silk, with scarlet ribbons at her throat and scarlet flowers in her hair.

When Nathaniel—poor fellow, how his empty sleeve annoyed him—and I arrived, Mrs. McChilly and her grandchildren were already there—the old lady in the easiest chair in the room, nearest the fire, with a glass of lemonade, of which she was very fond (how did Widow Winterpippin manage to find out everybody's little weaknesses in the way of eating and drinking?), on a small round table by her side, and the grandson and his wife looking over the photograph album in a cozy corner.

Mr. and Mrs. Rose and the three rosebuds, as we called the children, wee, darling, auburn-haired girls, came in at the same time we did, and Mr. and Mrs. Summer, he looking worn and haggard and she with traces of tears around her beautiful eyes—and the baby—made their appearance in a few moments later.

"And now that we are almost all here," said Widow Winterpippin—we wondered who else was to come—"we'll have a dance to begin with. You will play, Mrs. Summer? Nannie can hold the baby."

But Mrs. Summer blushed and said she "never played, now."

"But you can," insisted the widow in her genial way. "You surely have not forgotten. I used to hear you playing so much and so well when you first moved here, and Mr. Summer sang then, too. Many a happy hour have I passed listening to you both." And Mr. Summer, with a conscious, contrite look in his face, put his arm around his wife and led her to the piano.

Then Nathaniel took the widow, and Mr. Summer Mrs. McChilly's granddaughter by marriage, and Mrs. McChilly's grandson Mrs. Rose, and Mr. Rose me, and we had an old-fashioned quadrille dance in the old-fashioned way—and a jig to end with. And Mrs. McChilly declared it made her feel like dancing herself, and she would have danced, too, I believe, if it hadn't been for her rheumatic foot. As it was, she beat time to the jig tune with her cane until her arm was so tired she couldn't beat any longer, and Nannie and the baby took it and beat away, utterly regardless of time, until all the ladies had made their final curtseys to their partners.

After the dance we had a lovely ballad from Mr. Summer, who had a fine tenor voice, and a comic song from Mr. Rose, who had a voice suited to it. The comic song had a silly, rollicking chorus in which the company all joined with as much earnestness as though their lives depended upon their doing so:

Tra-la-tra-la-la-la-la,
Tra-la-li—and that will do.

And then supper. Such a supper! Roast turkey, cranberry sauce, mince pie, crisp celery, home-made bread, pickles, tongue, stewed oysters, candies and wax dolls (the dolls beside the children's plates). And when we were all through and back to the parlor again, sitting in a half-circle around the grate-fire, a cup of fragrant tea or coffee in every hand, Widow Winterpippin, who sat in the center of the half-circle, said: "And now, if no one has any objection, I would like to tell you a wonderful dream I had last night."

"Any objection!" "No, indeed!" "Delighted to hear it!" from all sides. And, while the Summer baby crowed itself to sleep in its mother's arms, and the Rosebuds, on the floor at their father's feet—each with her new doll clasped to her breast—drooped their shining heads until they sank upon the pillows, Nannie had thoughtfully placed near them, the chairs in the half-circle were drawn closer and all eyes were fastened on the Widow Winterpippin's sunny face.

"I went to bed last night," began the widow, in a low voice, "very tired."

"I should think so," said every woman listener.

"And I began to dream directly. And everybody in this house was in that dream," the widow went on. "Yes, children and all. I thought it was Christmas night, just as it is now, and Nannie and I were waiting, just as we did to-night, for the company to arrive. And they began to arrive as the clock struck 7. First came Mr. and Mrs. Rose and the rosebuds, looking so smiling and happy that I said at once, 'You have good news to tell me.'

"'Mrs. McChilly—dear, kind Mrs. McChilly—(Mrs. McChilly sat bolt upright in her chair and closed her lips firmly as her name was mentioned), has paid the doctor's bill,' Mrs. Rose began. 'And promised, she having so many business acquaintances, to look for a situation for me,' said Mr. Rose. 'And she says to-day is the birthday of the Savior and He dearly loved little children, and she it going to love us for His sake and be our friend always as long as we are good,' said the children, beginning to sing the 'Sweet By-and-By' so loudly that we did not hear Mr. Aubrey come in; but there he was, his face glowing and his eyes sparkling (Mr. Aubrey was the grandson with whom Mrs. McChilly had quarreled); and he cried out, 'God bless her! my mother's mother. I knew she couldn't stay mad long. She's forgiven me and kissed Alice.' (Alice was the young girl with whom he had fallen in love without the old lady's permission.)

"And all of a sudden there was Mrs. McChilly among them, being welcomed with loving words, and hugs and smiles—the eldest rosebud had a glass of lemonade ready for her—and saying, 'Dear, dear, what is a little money to gratitude and affection like this?'

"'Nothing,' answered Mr. Summer, who was there all of a sudden, too, with his wife and the baby, looking as handsome as he did when I first saw him nearly two years ago, and as for Mrs. Summer, her eyes were like stars and her cheeks like roses, and she stole softly to my side, while he was tossing the baby and singing a merry song to it, and whispered: 'A promise has been my Christmas gift, a promise worth all the gold and jewels in the world.' And then Susie Bracket danced in and slyly held up a letter from somebody far away, that I might see and rejoice with her. And Nathaniel Bracket was. Really, I don't think I can tell it."

"Oh, but you must," I cried.

"Indeed you must," they all cried.

"Well, if I must, I must," said the widow, with a sweet, little nervous laugh, "I thought Nathaniel followed me into the dining-room, where I had gone to take a last look at the supper table—oh, it's too ridiculous."

"Nothing of the sort," said Mr Summer. "I don't believe it. I've no doubt it was the most sensible thing Nathaniel ever did—in a dream."

"And please go on," begged his wife.

"And he took my hand," the widow went on, "and said—oh! I can't tell you all I dreamed he said, but he ended by saying: 'And so, of course, I must think of you no longer—a poor, crippled fellow like me.' And I said—"

"What did you say?" cried Nathaniel, springing to his feet and looking eagerly toward her, totally forgetful of the rest of the company.

"'Nathaniel Bracket, you're an idiot!'"

"Just as I expected," murmured poor Nat, sinking into his chair again.

"'If you have lost your arm—your right arm,'" the widow calmly proceeded, "'you haven't lost your head, and that head, as I happen to know, contained the usual, perhaps a little more than the usual, amount of brains, and if, as I hear, a thousand or two will give you an interest in Tom Allen's business, why what is to prevent me, having a little money at my command and no one to take care of but myself, lending it to you—for the sake of your sister, of whom I am very fond? Or, if you won't look at it in that way, why can't I become a partner, a very silent one, and you manage for me, taking a fair equivalent for your services?' And that's the end——"

"Never!" shouted Nat, springing from his chair once more and taking a few steps toward her, "The dream never ended in that way. Nathaniel made some further remark, I'm sure he did."

"I believe he did," said the widow, knitting her pretty brows, as though in thought, while a rosy blush overspread her face, "but dreams grow so shadowy at the last and this became so very indistinct after I had spoken of going into the printing business myself that I can scarcely remember—"

"That Nat Bracket said," prompted Nathaniel, "God bless you for a darling! and I'll accept the offered loan on condition that you'll add to it a Christmas gift—a gift above all price—your precious self."

"Well, well, how did you ever know?" exclaimed the widow in pretended surprise.

"Can't imagine," said Nat, his eyes sparkling with fun for a moment, and then, as she rose from her seat, he came and stood before her and said entreatingly, "But I don't know what answer you dreamed you made."

"Nor I," laughed the widow.

"But I do," said Mrs. McChilly, with an emphatic rap of her cane; "I do—Mrs. Nathaniel Bracket."

And we all shouted and clapped our hands like a parcel of children, and then we all—not one of us, I'm sure, could have told why—cried a little, and were quietly feeling for our handkerchiefs to wipe away the tears, when the old lady spoke again, looking down on the rosebuds, who were still sleeping. "I will be a friend to these little ones and their parents," she said, "a good friend. That part of the dream shall come true. As for my grandson ——"

"Here he is," screamed Nannie, with a hysterical laugh, as she flung open the door that led into the dining-room.

And there he was, to be sure, with his sweetheart on his arm, and in an instant they were both kneeling before their grandmother, with one of her wrinkled hands in blessing on each bowed young head.

Mr. Summer turned from the pretty tableau and bent and kissed his wife, and softly whispered something to her that made her "eyes like stars" indeed, as she exclaimed, in a voice trembling with joy, "My part of the wonderful dream has already come true."

"And mine came true this morning," said I, as I took the letter from my pocket.

"And mine," stammered Nat, as his only arm stole around the widow's waist, "can it come true?"

"It can," said Widow Winterpippin.

SIR BOYLE ROCHE.

The Celebrated Irish Bull-Perpetrator—An Interesting Letter.

The most notorious bull perpetrator was Sir Boyle Roche, who was elected member for Tralee in 1775. He had a regular blundering reputation. He was known upon one occasion, after a withering exposure or patriotic denunciation of Government, to say, with solemn gravity: "Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of every true lover of his country to give his last guinea to save the remainder of his fortunes!" Or, if the subject of debate was some national calamity, he would deliver himself thus: "Sir, single misfortunes never come alone, and the greatest of all national calamities is generally followed by one much greater."

Sir Boyle Roche belonged to the ancient family of De La Russe, of Lermoy; he was created a Baronet in 1782, and was married to the eldest daughter of Sir James Caldwell, but had no heir. He used to account for his lack of progeny by saying "that it was hereditary in our family to have no children." Another of his blunders was made when speaking of the fish-hawkers. "They go down to Ringsend," he observed, "buy the herrings for half nothing, and sell them for twice as much." A letter supposed to have been written by Sir Boyle Roche during the Irish rebellion of 1798 gives an amusing collection of his various blunders. Perhaps he never put so many on paper at a time, but his peculiar turn for "bulls" is here shown at one view.

The letter was first printed in the Kerry Magazine, now out of print:

DEAR SIR: Having now a little peace and quiet, I sit down to inform you of the bustle and confusion we are in from the blood-thirsty rebels, many of whom are now, thank God, killed and dispersed. We are in a pretty mess; can get nothing to eat, and no wine to drink except whisky. When we sit down to dinner we are obliged to keep both hands armed. While I write this I have my sword in one hand and my pistol in the other. I concluded from the beginning that this would be the end; and I am right, for it is not half over yet. At present there are such goings-on that everything is at a standstill. I should have answered your letter a fortnight ago, but I only received it this morning; indeed, hardly a mail arrives safe without being robbed.

No longer ago than yesterday the mail-coach was robbed near this town; the bags had been very judiciously left behind for fear of accidents, and, by great good luck, there was nobody in the coach, except two outside passengers, who had nothing for the thieves to take. Last Thursday an alarm was given that a gang of rebels in full retreat from Drogheda were advancing under the French standard; but they had no colors nor any drums except bagpipes. Immediately every man in the place, including women and children, ran out to meet them. We soon found our force a great deal too little, and were far too near to think of retreating. Death was in every face; and to it we went. By the time half our party were killed we began to be all alive.

Fortunately, the rebels had no guns, except pistols, cutlasses and pikes, and we had plenty of muskets and ammunition. We put them all to the sword; not a soul of them escaped, except some that were drowned in an adjoining bog. In fact, in a short time nothing was heard but silence. Their uniforms were all different—chiefly green. After the action was over we went to rummage their camp. All we found was a few pikes, without heads, a parcel of empty bottles filled with water and a bundle of blank French commissions, filled up with Irish names. Troops are now stationed round, which exactly squares with my ideas of security. Adieu. I have only time to add that I am yours in haste. B. R.

P. S.—If you do not receive this, of course it must have miscarried; therefore, I beg of you write and let me know.

The Pathan.

For mere brutality and roughness the people of Afghanistan have no rivals in the world. Though they may be the most pious of Moslem, they discriminate among the injunctions of the Prophet. To exterminate the infidel is a duty welcomed with enthusiasm, but the command to bathe is quietly ignored. It may be regarded as an invasion of private life not to be tolerated by any independent Pathan. Accordingly, he does not wash his face in a month, his body never. His great head has never known a comb. His clothing of felt or sheep-skin is generations old. No savage half-human is so dirty, none so shameless in vice. Looking on these ferocious giants, one must shudder to think of their forefathers' part in history. Imagine their foul rush upon the delicate peoples of India, like a swooping of fetid vultures on a sick lamb! Imagine the sack of Delhi by these brutes! I have seen the worst savages of every continent, and I aver that there are none so hideous as the Pathan. In his eye, large but furtive, his marked features and set mouth, the gentle feelings of humanity have not a trace of expression. The child scowls and strikes; the man has no thought but of plunder and blood. His laugh is ready enough, a rough, hoarse guffaw, which shows the black fangs through his unkempt beard; but no one ever saw the Afghan peasant smile.—All the Year Round.

German Newspapers.

We may call attention to the extraordinary progress the press has been making of late years in Germany, under constitutions that are either liberal or profess to be so. Those small-sized German papers are priced comparatively dear. Yet the proprietors occasionally perform feats of enterprise that are worthy of their confreres in London or New York. There is the Kolnische Zeitung, for example, which has still its head office in the old Rhenish city, though it is a Berlin journal to all intents and purposes. Its war intelligence during the Franco-German war was admirable; its foreign correspondence is invariably excellent, and its leading articles are lucid, pointed and closely reasoned. But its most conspicuous features are its reporting and distribution. It has its staff of short-hand writers in a gallery in the Chambers of the Capitol, who relieve each other every ten minutes, and the notes of each reporter are flashed immediately along the electric wires to Cologne. There they are printed and published in time for dispatch by the night train, and the paper circulates in Berlin in time to be laid on the breakfast tables. The number of home subscribers has increased in ten or twelve years from about 12,000 to 26,000—a very creditable total for a country like Germany, and a separate edition is published besides for transmission to foreign countries. More significant still of the growing interest in public affairs is the state of things in Southern Germany. Before 1848, with the exception of the Government Gazette, there was no political newspaper in Vienna. In 1860 there were over a hundred journals of one kind or another; while in the Exhibition year, before the financial crash, according to figures in the official statistics, they had increased to 355. Nothing can be more perfectly organized than the chief establishments, so far at least as the literary arrangements are concerned. Each sub-editor has his department—home politics, foreign affairs, finance, etc.—and, while their apartments are as handsome as we might expect in a city that half-ruined itself by extravagance in building, we believe that great improvements have been introduced of late years in the mechanical departments.—Blackwood's Magazine.

The Paris Editor.

Paris editors take their professional duties easily. Many of the most conspicuous of them have always been active politicians, probably with seats in the Chamber, and with other irons in the fire. They press their opinions in the signed contributions which may one day be the stepping-stones to high office. As they object to evening work, for many reasons, it is hard to get a suitable man to edit a morning journal, and, accordingly, most of the papers of the French capital appear in the afternoon. His most intimate friends would mistrust their senses if they met a London editor in a ball-room after midnight; while in Paris it is the chief part of an editor's business to show himself everywhere in a certain society—to attend the receptions of the Ministers or Opposition leaders, as the case may be, and to drop in, besides, at the unofficial reunions where his political friends are in the habit of rallying. He has probably a liking for society for its own sake, and it is at once his pleasure and his duty to feel the pulse of society for himself, in place of trusting, like his English confrere, to the second-hand reports of intimates who are mixing in the world, at any rate. Then he need never have the sense of working at high pressure. Far more often than not he writes on the domestic subjects which are always in his mind; and, when he has occasion to treat some question of foreign policy, he does so deliberately, after ripe consideration. The minor contents of his meager sheet demand comparatively little supervision, and that little may be confided to intelligent subordinates. With the exception of the Temps, there are few Parisian papers that take any great trouble about their foreign correspondence, and the sum total of the mechanical labor must, of course, be proportionately small.—Blackwood's Magazine.

The Deepest Well in the World.

The sinking of the deep artesian well near Buda Pesth, Hungary, is now completed; the works were commenced as far back as 1868, and during their progress many interesting facts relating to geology and underground temperature have been brought to light. The total depth is 3,200 feet, and the temperature of the water it yields is nearly 165 deg. Fahr. The temperature of the mud brought up by the borer was taken every day, and was found to increase rapidly, in spite of the loss of heat during its ascent, down to a depth of 2,300 to 2,700. Beyond this point the increase was not so marked. At a depth of 3,000 feet the temperature was 177 deg. Fahr., giving an average increase of one for every twenty-three feet bored. Water first commenced to well up at a depth of 3,070 feet; here its temperature was 110 deg. Fahr., and from this point onward it rapidly increased both in quantity and temperature. Thus, at 3,092 feet, its temperature had already risen to 150 deg. Fahr., and the yield in twenty-four hours from 9,500 to 44,000 gallons. Finally, when the boring had reached 3,200 feet, at which point it was stopped, the temperature of the water, as it burst from the orifice of the tube, was 165 deg. Fahr., and the volumetric yield 272,000 gallons in the twenty-four hours. This yield was afterward reduced to 167,200 gallons, in consequence of the bore being lined with wooden tubes, which reduced its diameter. The water obtained disengages carbonic acid in abundance, and also contains nitrogen and a little sulphureted hydrogen, and eighty grains per gallon of fixed matters, chiefly sulphates and carbonates of potash, soda, lime, and magnesia.—Scientific American.

THE TRYST.

Impelled by memory in a wayward mood,
Reluctant, yearning, with a faithless mind,
I sought once more a long-neglected spot.
A wooded upland bordered by the sea,
Whose tides were swirling up the reedy sands,
Or floating noiseless in the yellow marsh.
My way was wild. The winds, awaking, smote
My face, but as I passed the ruined wall
Brambles and vines and waving blossoms dashed
A frolic welcome, like a summer rain.
Shouldering the hills against the murky east
Stood stalwart oaks, and in the mossy sod
Below the trembling birches whispered me.
"Not here!" I reached the silence-loving pines,
And lingered. The mists swept from wooded hills
And, rolling seaward, hid the anchored ship
So, happy, dreaming an old dream again
Of keeping tryst in secret on the knoll,
I wandered on, listening in dreamy maze
To sounds I thought familiar—the approach
Of well-known footsteps in the leafy path—
A murmuring voice calling me by name!
Through the pine shafts the sunless light of dawn
Stole. Day was come. My dream would be fulfilled!
Above the hill the sky began to blaze,
And ushering morn the west flushed rosy-red;
Then, the sun leaping from his bed of gold,
Scattered cloud-banners, crimson, gray, and white.
There was my shadow in the leafy path
Alone—none was to keep the tryst with me!
No voice, no step among the hills I heard.
The joyous swallows from their nestlings flew,
Mad in the light with song. Far out at sea
The white sails fluttered in the eager breeze,
But day was silent holding tryst with me—
My pilgrimage rewarded—faith restored.

RUSSIA.

A Possible Abdication of the Czar.

[From the Chicago Tribune.]

Once more the rumors come that the Czar of Russia, burdened with the cares of state and weighed down by disappointments, has again fallen a prey to melancholy, which, in a man of his habits and temperament, is tantamount to insanity. It is not the first time that rumors of this kind have been set afloat, nor is it the first time that he has given way to what Berlioz used to call his "black philosophy," and barely escaped an outbreak of that insanity which has always been latent in his nature. It made its appearance at the time of Russia's defeat in the Crimean war, and again in the recent war in the reverses that preceded the fall of Plevna, and since that time the plottings of Slavophiles and the assaults of Nihilists seem to have brought him to a crisis where insanity can only be averted by abdication and a complete dismissal of official cares.

It is not remarkable that a ruler predisposed to insanity and of a habitually gloomy and melancholy cast of mind, like the Czar, should yield to despair, and see no avenue of escape from his troubles except by yielding his throne to his successor which he has occupied twenty-four troubled years. Physically and mentally constituted as he is, he is an old man at 61, and has no longer youthful determination or manly vigor to shake off his troubles, nor a hopeful future to which he can look forward. He is full of disappointment. His own family is in league against him. His counselors thwart his schemes. His people are irritated at his despotic government, and are more and more permeated with the liberal ideas of Western Europe. The Slavophile party makes rapid progress, and is constantly bringing pressure to bear upon him for the foundation of a great Slavonic empire south of the Danube. His empire is so honeycombed with Nihilism that he cannot trust his own officials, and assassination, once more inaugurated by Vera Sassulich, has become the most familiar agency of his political enemies, and has not hesitated to strike at his own life. Twice within a year the assassins have been on his track, and any day, any moment, they may reappear. His policy has been overruled more than once by Gortschakoff, and even Ignatieff. The Treaty of Berlin paid little attention to his demands, and Bismarck overruled him at nearly every point. In its workings it has conflicted with the ambitions of Russia and has substantially isolated her. She was compelled to give up Roumelia, which she wanted. Her last soldier has been withdrawn from the region south of the Balkans, but Austria remains there in possession of an immense area of country, with ideas antagonistic to her own. European alliances have been formed, and she remains without an ally; while, with the prospect of a war with Germany in the not very distant future, she finds Austria and Germany leagued together on the Eastern question and England behind them. In Central Asia, Russian affairs are gloomy. It is evident that the defeat of the Russian expedition by the Tekke Turcomans is more of a disaster than the Government is willing to admit, and that all operations in that direction must be suspended for some time to come.

Should the Czar abdicate he will be succeeded by the Czarewitch Alexander, now in his 34th year, who married the Grand Duchess Marie Dagmar, daughter of Christian IX., of Denmark, in 1866. His advent to the throne will be more in the interests of the Russian people than the administration of the Czar, though it will be likely to precipitate war with Germany, as he has no admiration for that power, and is not allied to Frederick William by immediate family ties. On the other hand, however, he is a much more liberal man than his father, and much nearer to his people. He has traveled much, and is in sympathy with liberal ideas, and is represented to be in favor of constitutional government, which, after all, lies at the foundation of Nihilistic purposes. It is probable that his accession to the throne will be the end of personal government, as well as of military despotism, and in such case an entirely new and more liberal policy will prevail, and one which will be a benefit to his colossal empire. Under any circumstances, it is plain that the abdication of the Czar would be the greatest blessing he could confer upon his subjects, and that any change will be preferable to the continuance of the present regime.

Science and God.

Physical considerations do not lead to the final explanation of all that we feel and know.

We meet a problem which transcends any conceivable explanation of the powers which we now possess.

We may think of the subject again and again, but it eludes all intellectual presentation.

Having thus exhausted physics and reached its very rim, a mighty mystery still looms beyond us. We have, in fact, made no step toward its solution. We try to soar a vacuum when we endeavor to pass by logical deduction from the one to the other.

Religious feeling is as much a verity as any other part of human consciousness; and against it, on its subjective side, the waves of science beat in vain.

I could see that his (Carlyle's) contention at bottom was that the human soul has claims and yearnings which physical science cannot satisfy.

It seems high time to him (Virchow) to enter an energetic protest against the attempts that are made to proclaim the problem of research as actual facts, and the opinions of scientists as established science.

We ought not, Virchow urges, to represent our conjectures as a certainty, nor our hypotheses as a doctrine; this is inadmissible.

The burden of my writings in this connection is as much a recognition of the weakness of science as an assertion of its truth.

If asked whether science had solved, or is likely in our day to solve, the problem of the universe, I must shake my head in doubt. Behind and above and around us the real mystery of the universe lies unsolved and, as far as we are concerned, is incapable of solution. The problem of the connection of body and soul is as insoluble in its modern form as it was in the pre-scientific ages.

There ought to be a clear distinction made between science in the state of hypothesis and science in the state of fact.

And, inasmuch as it is still in its hypothetical stage, the ban of exclusion ought to fall upon the theory of evolution.

After speaking of the theory of evolution as applied to to the primitive condition of matter, as belonging to the dim twilight of conjecture, the certainty of experimental inquiry is here shut out.

Those who hold the doctrine of evolution are by no means ignorant of the uncertainty of their data, and they only yield to it a provisional assent.

In reply to your question they will frankly admit their inability to point to any satisfactory experimental proof that life can be developed, save from demonstrable antecedent life.

I share Virchow's opinion that the theory of evolution in its complete form involves the theory that, at some period or other of the earth's history, there occurred what would now be called spontaneous generation. I agree with him that the proofs of it are still wanting.

I hold with Virchow that the failures have been lamentable, that the doctrine is utterly discredited.—Prof. Tyndall, in the Fortnightly Review.

The man who is constitutionally incapable of taking advice needs to be very wise indeed. For, says the proverb: "The truth which we least wish to hear is the one which it is most to our advantage to know."

Contentment produces, in some measure, all those effects which the alchemist usually ascribes to what he calls the philosopher's stone, and, if it does not bring riches, it does the same thing by banishing the desire for them.

These are the rules I have always accepted: First, labor; nothing can be had for nothing; whatever a man achieves he must pay for; and no favor of fortune can absolve him from his duty. Secondly, patience and forbearance, which is simply dependent on the slow justice of time. Thirdly, and most important, faith. Unless a man believe in something far higher than himself; something infinitely purer and grander than he can ever become; unless he has an instinct of an order beyond his dreams of laws; beyond his comprehension of beauty and goodness and justice beside which his own ideals are dark, he will fail in every loftier form of ambition, and ought to fail.—Bayard Taylor.

A Strange Romance.

That "truth is stranger than fiction" is once more aptly exemplified by the following curious narrative, which reaches the Nazione from its correspondent at Lucca: "Some years ago a native of Casamaggiore emigrated to America, leaving behind him his wife and two children. Shortly after his arrival in the States, where he promptly found lucrative employment, he sent 100 lire to the priest of his native place, to be by him conveyed to his family. A few months later this remittance was followed by a second of 1,000 lire; and at subsequent periods other sums were forwarded in the same manner, to the total amount of 25,000 lire, or £1,000. The priest, however, to whom this money was transmitted put it in his own pocket. One day, having come to the conclusion that he had derived sufficient profit from his agency, he sent for the woman and informed her, with many consolatory reflections, that her husband was dead. About the same time he wrote to the emigrant, stating that the latter's wife and children had succumbed to an epidemic which had all but depopulated Casamaggiore, and inclosed in his letter an official certificate of their death and burial. It appears that, after a while, the emigrant, believing himself to be a widower, married again. He prospered in business, became a wealthy man, and a few months ago determined to visit the place of his birth. In due time he arrived with his second wife and family at Casamaggiore, where he took up his quarters at the principal inn. Strolling out to look up some of his old acquaintances, a little beggar boy followed him, importuning him for alms. Something in the child's appearance arrested his attention. He asked the boy his name, and found him to be his own son. Further inquiry soon elicited the fact that his wife and two children were living, but in the utmost poverty and distress. The reverend embezzler, when confronted with his victims, offered to refund the 25,000 lire; but the affair had come to the knowledge of the police authorities, who refused to permit any compromise, and arrested the holy man, against whom proceedings have been taken by the state. Meanwhile, his unfortunate ex-parishioner finds himself saddled with two wives and families, between whose claims upon his affection and support there is, equitably speaking, nothing to choose either way.—London Telegraph.

A VISION OF DEATH.

Saved by a Workingman's Presence of Mind.

[From the Bradford Era.]

The infernal—yet very useful—compound is so swift and terrible in its work, and co-annihilatory in its effects, that many persons experience a singular feeling if even in the presence of the harmless-looking fluid. They know that a slight concussion would send them into eternity with the rapidity of the lightning's flash, and hardly a trace of their bodies be found. Men who are accustomed to nitro-glycerine are supposed, to have some of these feelings, and nerve is a necessary requisite. Nevertheless, the presence of appalling danger sometimes frustrates the best of them, as will be seen by the following incident:

At a certain factory not a hundred miles from Bradford were gathered the members of the firm and some workmen. The gentlemen were intently watching the process of manufacturing the explodent, when one of them incautiously dropped his cigar-stub on the floor, which was covered with running water, bearing on the surface small particles of nitro-glycerine. The latter caught fire and burned brilliantly with a sputtering noise. To say that these spectators were alarmed would be to put it very mildly. They were simply paralyzed with terror, and watched the spreading fiery stream with the helpless fascination with which a victim is said to look in the glittering eyes of a rattlesnake. All around them were cans filled with nitro-glycerine, enough to annihilate an army, and every man felt as though he was the victim of a hideous night-mare which held him powerless. Flight was impossible; their limbs refused to perform their office, and an awful death seemed inevitable. The apparently doomed men saw the little lake of fire spread slowly but surely on the floor, but the flames hissed as though in triumph at the certain death that seemed to await their victims. None of the spectators will soon forget this thrilling episode in their lives, and money could not hire them to repeat the experiment. When the fire had almost reached a can filled with glycerine, one of the workmen aroused from his lethargy, and, taking off his coat, spread it on the floor and extinguished the flames, when, of course, all danger ceased. One of the gentlemen present, when describing his experience, said: "I never knew before what it was to be sick from fear. When I saw the infernal stuff burning, and felt that every man of us would be blown to atoms in five seconds, every muscle of my body seemed pal-ied. I gasped for breath, my head swam, and I only felt a deathly sensation of nausea in my stomach. All present turned an ashy paleness of the face. Then I vainly wondered whether there would be any pain in the death-stroke. The remembrance of a nitro-glycerine horror, where the still palpitating heart—of one of its victims was picked up a minute after the explosion came to my mind, and I surmised whether my heart would undergo that strange experience after being torn from my body. The thought of my family caused me the most poignant anguish, and tears coursed down my cheeks. Then several incidents of my life, of which I can not speak with pride, were vividly presented to my mind's eye, and induced vague reflections on the subject of future punishment. Sometimes in my dreams I have felt myself in the presence of frightful peril, such as lying in the path of an express train or tottering on the brink of a vast abyss, but was utterly incapable of moving hand or foot for my preservation. So I seemed in this case. I could not lift a finger, though there was comparative safety in flight; paralyzed with terror was literally my condition. After what seemed to be an eternity of waiting for my inevitable fate, my attention was arrested by a movement on the part of the workman, who took off his coat hurriedly. Then he bent forward, and, with the utmost deliberation, laid it on the pool of fire, moving it gently along and patting it with his hands until every spark was extinguished. The reaction from the terrible suspense was almost overpowering, and I felt weak as a child, but on going out into the open air my old-time spirits came back very rapidly. May I never have another such experience."

The Strides of the Telephone.

A new agreement has been made between the Bell Telephone Company and the Western Union Company. All the telephone patents owned by the latter company are to be transferred to the former. This also includes all the Bell, Gray, Edison and Blake transmitters and all other instruments connected with the telephone service. The Western Union will be paid the cost price of all the instruments that it turns over, and will hereafter receive one-fifth of all business returns. The capital stock of the Bell Telephone Company is increased from $850,000 to $8,000,000. There are at present 100,000 telephones in use in the United States, and 4,000 have already been introduced in London. It has been patented in the United States, Canada, Italy, Austria, France, England, Spain, Portugal and Australia, and protection has been asked in Russia, Denmark, Norway and Sweden. Messages can now be sent over only 100 miles of submarine cable, but Prof. Bell announces that he has overcome this difficulty, and that before many weeks a person in this country can converse with a person in England.

NO BULLDOZING IN THIS.

More Colored Pupils Than White in South Carolina Schools; also, More Colored Children Now in Attendance Than Under Carpet-bag Rule.

[Columbia (S. C.) Cor. New York Sun.]

The persistent assertions made that the negroes of the South are systematically oppressed and terrorised is certainly disproved, so far as South Carolina is concerned at least, by facts taken from the annual report of the State Superintendent of Education. Many who give no credence to the blood-curdling tales of horror so industriously circulated on the eve of important elections are nevertheless inclined to believe that, while the Southern Democrats yield obedience to the Reconstruction acts and respect the political and civil rights of the negro, they studiously refrain from taking any steps to ameliorate his condition or elevate his intellectual status. An examination of these educational statistics conclusively proves that the Democratic party of the South heartily lends a helping hand to the newly-enfranchised citizen. By the report in question it appears that the total school attendance for the years 1878–'9 was 122,463, of which 58,868 were white pupils and 64,095 colored, an excess of 5,727 colored pupils. During the period of reconstruction, between the years 1868 and 1876, the average colored attendance in the State was 41,691. The average colored attendance during the three years of Democratic rule has been 60,723, an increase of 45 per cent. Every school district in the State contains separate schools for white and for colored children. These run for an equal period of time, and are alike paid from the treasury.

The first colored school in Charleston, the Morris Street School, was established by a Democratic City Board in 1867. In 1868, a Republican Board was elected, and during its term of two years the attendance at the school never exceeded 900. In 1871, the schools of Charleston were closed, and teachers' salaries for six months remained unpaid. A Democratic board, elected in 1871, found empty schools and an empty treasury. The schools, including the colored one, were reopened. Since then the attendance in the Morris Street School has steadily increased. During the past year it had an enrollment of 1,404 pupils, under twenty-six teachers. Other first-class colored schools in the city run up the attendance to 3,568, while the entire county shows a colored attendance of 7,800.

This favorable showing is by no means confined to Charleston, but is general through the State. It will be sufficient to cite the returns from Edgefield, Aiken, and Barnwell counties. These are given only because, in bloody-shirt harangues, the names Edgefield, Hamburg, and Ellenton are synonymous with shot-gun Democracy, bulldozing and blood.

Edgefield reports 2,150 white and 1,980 colored pupils; Aiken, 2,220 white and 1,533 colored, and Barnwell 2,173 white and 2,544 colored. In Aiken the white population predominates; in the other two the blacks are somewhat in excess. If in these much-slandered counties the colored people, instead of fleeing terror stricken to the woods, are quietly pursuing their peaceful avocations, and raising cotton to sell for 11 cents a pound, while their children freely attend schools supported by a tax of which seven-eighths is paid by Democratic property holders, it is convincing proof that those tales of terror are fabrications out of whole cloth.

Again, in the whole State there are 2,090 white and 1,076 colored teachers. This is a most favorable showing for the colored race, and also for the Democratic officials who employ colored teachers for colored schools wherever they are found competent.

The only institution of higher learning in the State receiving State aid is the Claflin University and Agricultural College, devoted solely to the education of the colored race. Its President, Rev. Dr. Edward Cooke, is a Northern man, an eminent minister of the gospel, and a teacher of large experience. The faculty consists of seven instructors, two of whom are natives of the State. Over 200 students were enrolled last year. Here it may be added that native white teachers, bearing honored names in South Carolina, are engaged in the task of instructing the colored race. The Rev. P. F. Stevens, formerly Superintendent of the State Military Academy, a Confederate Colonel during the late war, and now Bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church, is the School Commissioner of Charleston county, and devotes himself with zealous ardor to the intellectual and spiritual elevation of the colored people of the seacoast. The principal of the Morris Street School is a distinguished graduate of the State Military Academy, and most of his assistants are graduates of the Charleston Normal School. This school building is the handsomest in the city, and was erected at a cost of $30,000.

The distribution of the Peabody fund may also be taken as an evidence of the educational facilities of the blacks. It is given only to a thoroughly graded school, containing at least 100 pupils, continuing in session ten months, and deriving a support from other sources of at least twice the amount contributed by the Peabody fund. During the years 1878–9 five white schools received $1,950, and five colored schools $2,250, the difference being due to the larger attendance in the schools of the latter class. To secure this fund a liberal support by the State was required by the terms of the Peabody trustees. In addition to the schools maintained by the State there are several excellent colored schools supported by missionary funds from the North.

When statistics show that the South raises 5,000,000 bales of cotton yearly, chiefly by colored labor, while colored children secure equal benefits from a school fund contributed principally by Democratic property-holders, it is easily seen why Liberia exodus associations and Kansas immigration societies alike fall still-born. Much needless sympathy is wasted upon the "oppressed negro" in the South. South Carolina does more for the colored population than many of the States who thank God that they are not as she is.

INDIANA ITEMS.

Logansport has fifty-nine licensed saloons.

Nearly 200 telephones are in use in Evansville.

Six divorces were granted by the court at Winchester the other day.

Great numbers of hogs are dying in Dearborn county, cut off by the hog cholera.

The old canal bed at Worthington is being filled up, and the space will be used for depot and tracks.

John Bufkin, one of the pioneers of Henry county, has died; also Absalom Poor, another pioneer.

William T. S. Manly, County Treasurer of Cass county, and a prominent citizen of Logansport, has died.

It is contemplated to have the cornerstone of the new State House laid next summer, with imposing Masonic ceremonies.

Elsie Johnson, the Randolph county farmer who swallowed two of his artificial teeth recently, suffers no inconvenience from the accident.

Three children of Robert Craig, at Union City, have been poisoned by eating cabbage over which Paris green had been sprinkled while growing.

Frank T. Thomas, a merchant of Winslow, was thrown from a buggy near Owensville, Gibson county, while driving at a break-neck speed along the road, and, falling on his head, was killed.

John Rowe, a wealthy farmer, living three miles north of Hagerstown, Wayne county, was poisoned by inhalation of vapor from red-oak timber, with which he was working. After suffering terrible agony for a time, he died.

Brower Ludlow, at his home on the Manchester pike, two miles from Lawrenceburg, a few days ago accidentally swallowed a pair of lady's scissors. There is slight hope of his recovery, as he has been bleeding internally since the accident.

The architect who was given the contract for supervising building a new Court House at Frankfort, Clinton county, seven years ago, has now got a verdict for $10,325 damages, because the work was enjoined, and he was thereby deprived of expected commissions.

The State Superintendent of Publi Instruction decides that, when a school has been established for colored children, none such can be found to attend it unless they reside within convenient distance, and that, in every case, the same rule is to be applied in deciding this matter as would be used in the case of white children.

At Logansport, Nancy I. Fancett, has been found guilty as an accessory to the murder of John R. Jackson, in September last, and sentenced to eight years in the penitentiary. Five others, including two daughters of Nancy, are yet to be tried. Nancy has been married five times, and, is now engaged to be married to one of the prisoners, Jack McMillen.

The Indiana State Grange, at its late session, elected the following officers: Grand Master, Aaron Jones, South Bend; Overseer, Nelson Pegg, Randolph county; Lecturer, Harvey D. Scott, Terre Haute; Steward, Moses Poindexter, Clark county. The reports of the grand officers show a decided growth of the order and a favorable condition of the subordinate granges.

There has been a great exodus of squirrels from Indiana to Kentucky, across the Ohio river, near New Amsterdam, in Harrison county. Heretofore the movement has been from south to north, and was attributed to the failure of the mast in the mountain region of Kentucky and Tennessee; but this year the squirrels are leaving Indiana when there is no failure of the mast.

Errors of Type and Telegraph.

Lately some one attempted to say that critics asserted Rubinstein was not a correct player. The printers corrected the slur by making it that he was "not a cornet player"—which is probably true. Another, essaying to describe a certain personage as "the great I am" of local matters, found that he was instead "the great 9 a. m."—a dreadful charge, if somewhat vague. According to a veracious Western paper, one editor was horrified by finding "The Death of an Angle Worm" heading an obituary, instead of the decorous "Death of an Aged Woman." The rascally Truth-Seeker had its name set up "Turtle-Seeker," recently—which was a severe joke for the turtles. Once a paragraph beginning "Miss Dickinson" (meaning the eloquent Anna), appeared with the auspicious start of "The disbursion," which naturally made the subsequent remarks somewhat confused. But the telegraph makes as amusing blunders as the type. A sentence of Lord Carnarvon's essay on sermons at a recent Anglican Diocesan Conference was thus dispatched: "The worst-paid country curate is expected to preach twice on Sunday with the persuasiveness of a journeyman tailor, and the eloquence of a barrow." For "journeyman tailor" read "Jeremy Taylor," and initial "barrow" with a capital letter, and all is right.

The Scaffold in Paris.

For the first time in living memory, there was not a single execution in the city of Paris for a year (1879). Since the beginning of the century the number of executions has been steadily decreasing both in Paris and the provinces. In the first quarter of the century the average for the whole of France was about 120 a year; and in the second half, during which the forging of bank notes ceased to be a capital offense, only 999 persons were executed out of 1,563 sentenced to death, this being equivalent to an average of rather less than forty a year. During the ten years from 1850 to 1860 there was a further decrease to 283 executions out of 502 capital sentences, or twenty-eight per annum; while between 1860 and 1870 only 119 persons were executed, or only ten each year. In the nine years which have since elapsed there have been ninety-eight executions, ten in 1871, twenty-four in 1872, fifteen in 1873, twelve in 1874, ten in 1875, 1876, and 1877, six in 1878.

Ireland.

Here are some figures about Ireland. In 1845 there were 8,250,000 people on the island. In '47, the year of the famine, the population was 8,025,274; in 1875 it was 5,309,494, and in '77 it was 5,338,906. Since 1851 there has been a decrease in farms under fifteen acres and an increase of holdings over fifteen acres. In '75 there were 51,459 patches of one acre, 69,098 of from one to five acres, 165,959 from five to fifteen acres and 137,669 farms of from fifteen to thirty acres. In '41 there were 491,278 mud huts of but a single room each; in '71 they had decreased two-thirds. There are fewer paupers in Ireland than in England, Scotland or Wales. In England every thirty-three of the population contain one pauper; in Wales the same proportion holds good; in Scotland there is one in every fifty-three, while in Ireland there is but one in every sixty-eight of the population. There is also much less crime in Ireland than in England in proportion to the population. In '76 four persons were sentenced to death in the former country, while thirty-two were sentenced in the latter; for crimes of which the penalty was imprisonment for life the numbers were fifty and 280 respectively. The proportion of minor offenses is much larger in England than in Ireland.

The Longevity of Icebergs.

Karl Weyprecht, in his work on the Polar sea, discusses the longevity of icebergs. Icebergs are subjected to disintegration after somewhat the same manner as rocks. They are full of crevasses, into which the water formed by melting penetrates. In winter this water freezes, and by its expansion all through the glacier a rupture of the mass ensues. "It is highly probable," he says, "that most of the icebergs afloat in winter are in such a condition that a very slight cause is sufficient to make them burst because of their state of internal tension. Every polar traveler can tell how a shot, the driving in of an ice anchor, or any other sudden vibration has brought about the catastrophe; cases have even occurred in which the sound of the voice alone was sufficient. An iceberg is always an unpleasant neighbor." So many are the causes which tend to destroy icebergs that the author concludes that "no berg exists which could withstand them more than ten years, and that commonly the life of a berg is much shorter." However this may be, doubtless the much larger Antarctic bergs last very much longer, as must necessarily occur, because of the greater uniformity of the climate to which they are exposed. The iceberg into which the Arizona ran recently must have been an unusually solid one.

An enormous conger eel, seven feet in length, and weighing forty-five pounds, was caught in the River Dee, in England, the other day.

Special Announcement.

We take pleasure in announcing that we have made arrangements with the publishishers of the STATE SENTINEL which enable us to make the following very liberal offer:

To all persons who pay their subscription account to date, we will send the COURIER and WEEKLY SENTINEL one year for $2.50 in advance. In addition to this we will make each subscriber a present of "THE LAW OF THE FARM," by Jas. B. McCreills, of the Indiana bar. This valuable phamphlet ought to be in the hands of every farmer in the state. The work embraces the following subjects:

1st. How to buy a farm.
2nd. How far the farm extends, or its proper boundaries.
3rd What the deed of a farm includes.
4th The farmer's rights in the road.
5th As to farm fences.
6th As to estray and trespassing animals.
7th The farmer's liabilities for his animals.
8th Of dogs—the farmer's liability for and protection against.
9th Of water rights and drainage.
10th Of trespassing on the farm.
11th The rights of adjoining proprietors to fruit and other trees on and near boundary lines.

The INDIANA WEEKLY STATE SENTINEL is an eight-page paper, (the same as the COURIER) and will contain a supplement of two additional pages about half of the time. It is the recognized organ of the democracy of Indiana, and will always be found full of news of a general character. Its editorials present strong argument in favor of economy and against class legislation, and its agricultural department is adapted to the wants of every farmer.

Remember that the $2.50 must be paid in advance, and the COURIER subscription account must be paid to date, in order to secure this liberal offer. tf.

Executor's Sale.

Notice is hereby given, that by virtue of an order of the DeKalb circuit court, the undersigned executor of the last will and testament of Emily Failer, deceased, will sell at private sale, the following premises in DeKalb county, in the state of Indiana, to-wit: The north west quarter of the south west quarter of section two, (2), in township number thirty-three, (33), north of range thirteen, (13), east, containing forty acres more or less.

TERMS: One third cash, the residue in two equal payments at twelve and eighteen months, the deferred payments to be secured by notes and mortgage on said premises, said notes to draw interest at six per cent., and waive valuation and appraisement laws. Proposals for the purchase of said premises will be received by me at my residence in said county until Saturday the 3rd day of January, 1880, at ten o'clock A. M., when said premises will be sold to the highest and best bidder, provided said bid is not less than appraised value of said premises.

HENRY HINES Executor.

MONEY TO LOAN

By the Union Central Life Insurance company, for five years at 8 per cent. secured by first lien on real estate worth at least double the amount of the loan (exclusive of improvements). It is the custom of the company to accept partial payments of the loan at any time to suit convenience, etc. We charge no commission, and your mortgage is held here within a few hours ride of your home. If you live, you are here to look after it yourself; if you die, you have made provisions to pay the debt just where you contracted it. For further particulars, apply to Thos. H. Sprott, Auburn Indiana.

$1500 TO $6000 A YEAR, or $2 to $20 a day in your own locality. No risk. Women do as well as men. Many make more than the amount stated above. No one can fail to make money fast. Any one can do the work. You can make from 50c to $2 an hour by devoting your evenings and spare time to the business. It costs nothing to try the business. Nothing like it for money making ever offered before. Business pleasant and strictly honorable. Reader, if you want to know all about the best paying business before the public, send us your address and we will send you full particulars and private terms free; samples worth $5 also free; you can then make up your mind for yourself. Address, GEORGE STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine. 33-1y.
